THE MAROONS OF THE WEST INDIES.

The West India Islands, during the last century, were troubled with a race of outlaws, whose existence is a curious corollary upon the working of the slave system. In all times and lands, one inevitable consequence of a legalized slavery is the constant tendency among the slaves to escape out of the pale of the society through which they are slaves, and thereby, as it frequently proves, to get beyond all laws whatsoever, the good as well as the bad. The timid suffer; and the bold, if they cannot throw off the yoke, fly from it as far as may be; and thus, by allowing freedom to none, the slave system generates a race of outlaws who subsist by war upon the body which has cast them out. It very rarely happens that a slaveholding country exists side by side with a free one, which may receive the refugee into its bosom, and under the guardianship of its institutions. Slavery, besides, in a productive point of view, is only worth keeping up in a thin population where labor is dear, both from the want of competition and the ease of acquiring land. Among populations like these, the superior land only is tilled; the mountains, marshes, and forests subsist as nature made them, offering a ready refuge and an impregnable fortress in which the fugitives may collect and grow apart.

In the beginning of the eighteenth century, almost every West India Island had its organized outlaws; hunters and robbers by turn, who, when game failed them, or prompted by revenge, stole into the cultivated flats, fired the canes, drove off the cattle, and often consummated their inroad with the massacre of the planter and his family. So dreadful a scourge were they, that the early West India records treat of nothing else. In the smaller islands, where the cover was less, they were hunted down and exterminated like so many wild beasts; in the larger, they lasted longer. In all alike they bore the same title of Maroons, which some derive from a native word signifying "wanderer," and others from "marrow," the Spanish name for the wild hog, on which they principally lived.

There is a very full and curious account of the Jamaica Maroons in the works of Dallas and Bryan Edwards—the one a soldier, and the other a civilian—who look at the subject very differently, yet agree in most of their details. The year 1733 was the end of a lengthy, troublesome warfare, stained with much bloodshed on both sides, in which the damage done by the Maroons was roughly reckoned at £240,000 sterling, besides a loss of from three to four thousand lives. For the next sixty years both parties lived at peace. A large tract was assigned to the Maroons, on which they hunted undisturbed, and where they built three small towns, or rather villages, the chief one called Trelawny Town. It would seem that a very few years of kindness, and attention to the introduction among them of humanizing habits, would have sufficed to absorb them peacefully among the free black population; but to take any trouble for a negro, never entered a planter's head in those days. The Maroons lived on hunting, as if in the middle of Africa—a kind of Pariahs, dreaded and neglected; and the planters lived on, heedless of the past and the coming peril, though Trelawny Town was only eighteen miles either way from the principal ports of Falmouth and Mondego Bay; and it needed but a three hours' march of the Maroons, as the event proved, to burn down half of the sugar plantations in the Island.

The slave emancipation act would have effectually dissolved this strange society, by destroying the causes which led to its existence; but it was destined to come to a more speedy and violent end. In 1794, the negro insurrection broke out in St. Domingo, and produced a great effect among the blacks throughout the West Indies. In the following year the Maroons were in full revolt. The war, which ensued lasted for a year and a half, and cost the Island, in direct expenditure, more than half a million sterling; and all the plantations were burned to ashes. Cultivation was at a stand, the courts of justice were shut up, the whole male white population was drafted into the militia, and the Island at large became one entire garrison. We have no intention to go into the details of this miserable conflict. The Maroons were not six hundred in number; the regular infantry employed against them alone amounted to fifteen hundred, with eight thousand militia; but the nature of the country and warfare made this disparity of numbers of little effect. From the precarious life which these savages had led, their powers of sight and hearing were incredibly acute; with their bare feet and hands they could climb trees and cliffs like monkeys; and their aim was deadly; it was a common thing among them to strike a dollar with a bullet at one hundred yards. The whole country was a mass of forest and underwood, impassable except to the Maroons, who cut narrow paths through it, known only to themselves, and would crawl for miles on hands and knees through the tracks made by the wild hogs, till, coming to an opening, their unerring muskets picked off the sentries, while the marksman was unseen. Driven at length from their towns, they retreated to a range of narrow glens in the interior, walled in by cliffs two hundred feet high, in which they continued as safe as in a fortress, till the English, by cutting a road, were enabled to bring up their heavy guns, and throw shells with effect from the upper ground, when the Maroons escaped at night through the cordon of troops, broke into small parties, and carried fire and sword through the Island.

At last the assembly, in the month of September, utterly desparing of success, resorted to an expedient which no extremity could could justify; they determined to send to Cuba for bloodhounds. The employment, according to Edwards, to which these dogs are generally put by the Spaniards, is the pursuit of wild bullocks, which they slaughter for the hides; and the great use of the dogs is to drive the cattle from such heights and recesses in the mountainous parts of the country as are least accessible to the hunters. Much opposition was made to the plan, as cruel and dastardly, reviving the worst atrocities of the Spaniards, and disgraceful to the British troops; but at length, on the 14th of December, a Commissioner landed at Montego Bay with forty chasseurs, or Spanish hunters, and about a hundred dogs.

When these new allies were landed, the wild and formidable appearance of the men and dogs spread terror through the place. The streets were cleared, the doors were shut, not a negro ventured to stir forth, as the muzzled dogs, ferociously making at every object, and dragging forward the chasseurs, who with heavy rattling chains hardly held them in, proceeded onwards.

Dallas, in his history, gives the following account of their first appearance before the Commander-in-chief:—"Anxious to review the chasseurs, General Walope left head quarters the morning after they were landed, before daybreak, and arrived in a postchaise at Seven Rivers, accompanied by Colonel Skinner, whom he appointed to conduct the intended attack. Notice of his coming having preceded him, a parade of the chasseurs was ordered, and they were taken to a distance from the house, in order to be advanced when the General alighted. The Spaniards soon appeared at the end of a gentle acclivity, drawn out in a line containing upwards of forty men, with their dogs in front, and muzzled, and held by cotton ropes. On receiving the command, fire, they discharged their guns, and advanced as upon a real attack. This was intended to ascertain what effect would be produced on the dogs if engaged under the fire of the Maroons. The volley was no sooner discharged, than the dogs rushed forward with the greatest fury, amid the shouts of the Spaniards, who were dragged on by them with irresistible fury. Some of the dogs, maddened by the shouts of attack, while held back by the ropes, seized on the stocks of the guns in the hands of their keepers and tore pieces out of them. Their impetuosity was so great, that they were with difficulty stopped before they reached the General, who found it necessary to get expeditiously into the chaise from which he had alighted; and if the most strenuous exertions had not been made to stop them, they would most certainly have seized upon his horses."

This scene was well got up, and had its effect. General Walope was ordered to advance on the 14th of January following, with his Spanish dogs in the rear. Their fame, however, had reached the Maroons, and the General had penetrated but a short way into the woods, when a supplication for mercy was brought from the enemy, and 200 of them soon after surrendered, on no other condition than a promise of their lives. "It is pleasing to observe," adds Edwards, "that not a drop of blood was spilt after the dogs arrived in the Island." Those who had actually borne arms were soon after transported to Halifax in North America, and ultimately to Sierra Leone, where it is believed their descendents are still to be found. A portion had sided throughout with the English. These have continued a separate people, for which their perfect acquaintance with the woods, and capacity of endurance completely fitted them; but partially civilized, and few in numbers, they differ in little from the rest of the free black population. In the British West Indies, the Maroons may be considered extinct.

HOW TO DROWN CONSCIENCE.

Of all means that can be used to put to sleep the voice of conscience, and destroy the moral sensibility of man, strong drink is the most effectual. In the history of crime we may trace its brutalizing influence to the deep draught. The effect is uniform. That which speaks within man to warn him against crime is most effectually silenced by it. Men are better prepared for murder, or crime, with a portion of alcohol in the stomach, than without it. They are less able to resist temptation to do wrong. It does not require the intoxicating draught—that is likely to stupify the brain, and unnerve the arm. But the moderate cup is the most appropriate. That best puts to sleep the still small voice while it rouses the animal energies. If a man wishes to commit a murder, or any other crime, and finds himself too good to do it, too much of a man, he cannot in the wide world search out so demoralizing, so dehumanizing an agent as alcohol. He may ransack the three kingdoms of nature in vain. He shall perpetrate the conceived crime sooner by the aid of a cup of alcoholic drink, than by any thing else. He shall be a murderer more readily under its influence, than by any other aid.

LOVE YOUR CHILDREN WISELY.—Give them your hearts into their bosoms, but not reins on their necks. Love them, I say; but still be careful and maintain that just authority and pre-eminence that God hath given over them. A parent that hath lost his authority, is as salt that hath lost its savor; like the log sent from Jupiter, every frog in the family is apt to lean upon him. And remember it, fond parents, there is nothing in the world that renders you more vile, cheap, contemptible in the eyes even of your children themselves, when they begin to put forth the first buds of reason—nothing that lays your authority more in the dust, and exposes you to the foot and spurn of your child, than sinful indulgence. "A foolish man despiseth his mother." Prov. 15: 20. His mother's folly made him a fool; of a foolish child he at length grows up into a man, but "a foolish man;" and this "foolish man despises his mother." If you are fathers, then take care of your honor; if mothers, be sure to carry it so as to preserve in your children that awful respect and reverence which they owe you. Gal. 1: 6; Heb. 21: 9.

THE MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH.

BY REV. J. J. LYONS.

Along the smooth and slender wires
The sleepless heralds run,
Fast as the clear and living rays
Go streaming from the sun.
No peals or flashes, heard or seen,
Their wond'rous flight betray,
And yet their words are quickly felt
In cities far away.

Nor summer's heat nor winter's hail
Can check their rapid course:
They meet, unmoved, the fierce wind's rage—
The rough wave's sweeping force:
In the long night of rain and wrath,
As in the blaze of day,
They rush, with news of weal or woe,
To thousands far away.

But faster still than tidings borne
On that electric chord,
Rise the pure thoughts of him who loves
The Christian's life and Lord—
Of him who taught, in smiles and tears,
With fervent lips to pray,
Maintains high converse, here on earth,
With bright worlds far away.

Aye, though no outward wish is breath'd,
Nor outward answer given,
The sighing of that human heart
Is known and felt in heaven.
Those long, frail wires, may bend and break,
Those viewless heralds stray;
But faith's least word shall reach the throne
Of God, though far away.

THE FATE OF SHERIDAN.

The close of the career of this brilliant but unfortunate man offers a picture of melancholy interest, while at the same time it conveys a solemn warning:

Closely following the shipwreck of character, Sheridan lost his seat in Parliament. This was almost equivalent to a loss of his personal liberty, for he was no longer safe from arrest. From this time to his death, he gathered in the harvest of long years of indolence, extravagance, and vice. Disease was secretly wearing away his originally powerful constitution. His face, once so full of intelligence and beauty, had become deformed and bloated with intemperance. His old friends looked coldly upon him. Brilliant powers of conversation and fascinating address no longer characterised the faded wit and shattered debauchee. The Prince Regent, for whom he had so often sacrificed his interest and his honor, left him, "naked to his enemies." All the mortifications which could result from wounded pride and vanity, and the sense of decaying intellect, thickened upon him. His ruin was swift and sure. His creditors seized upon every thing which the pawnbrokers had not already taken. Even Reynolds' portrait of his first wife as Saint Cecilia passed from his possession. In the spring of 1815, he was arrested and carried to a sponging house, where he was retained for two or three days. His life sufficiently shows that his sense of shame was not quick, but he was deeply humiliated at his arrest, feeling it as "a profanation of his person." And now came the misery of his last scene.

His last illness soon followed. Even his dying bed was not free from the incursion of writs and sheriffs. He was arrested, and would have been taken away in his blankets, had not the physician threatened the officer with the consequence of committing murder. At last, on the seventh of July, 1816, in his sixty-fifth year, he died.

Then came the mockery of a splendid burial. Dukes, royal and noble, bishops, marquesses, earls, viscounts, right honorables, emulously swelled his funeral. 'France,' said a French Journalist at the time, 'is the place for an author to live in, and England the place for him to die in.' In the Poet's Corner in Westminster Abby, the only spot remaining unoccupied was reserved for the body of him whose death bed was not safe from the sheriff's writ. Tom Moore, in a fine strain of poetical indignation, published just after Sheridan's death, thus cuttingly refers to the noble Lords who honored the funeral:

"How proudly they can press to the funeral array
Of him who they shunned in his sickness and sorrow!
How bailiffs may seize his last blanket to-day,
Whose pall shall be held by nobles to-morrow!"

TOLERATION.

"Who art thou, vain mortal, that darest intrude thyself between my God and me? If I have an account to settle with heaven, am I not competent to effect it myself? Can you be more interested than I am? or, if you are, why insult me, why denounce me—why publish me to the world as the vilest animal in existence? May I not possibly be right as well as you? If so, by what grant, either of Heaven or earth, can you be justified in assailing the purity of my motives? The great God of Heaven suffers me to enjoy liberty—suffers me to investigate freely, and without any fear, all subjects my mind may chance to pursue, and informs me by the eternal laws of my nature, that I can only believe as my understanding directs me. Yet you—you, dust and ashes of the earth—arrogating to yourself Heaven's power, would do what Heaven refuses to do—you would stay the progress of my mind—you would end all enquiry which did not exactly suit you—you would prostrate me in the eyes of society, and send me headlong to eternal punishment! Away, from this mad, persecuting spirit! Intolerance! Intolerance! [Benjamin Franklin.

HOW TO DESTROY A CHURCH.—"Refrain from attending conference and prayer-meetings, church-meetings, and the monthly concert. Read religious publicatians but little—the bible less. Be irregular in your attendance on public worship on the Sabbath, and regularly engaged in every (lawful) way to make money on week days. Enter your closet with unburdened heart, and retire confused by the rush of worldly thoughts through your mind. Converse not with your family on religion, or with any other. Pray not with your family. Those professors who observe these rules, will do more more to destroy the church than Fourierites, Jews, Universalists, and Deists." Reader, do you belong this class?

CHARACTER IMPORTANT TO A YOUNG MAN.

An aged man may, as an individual, be eminently good or evil, but his character is constantly losing its importance in reference to the world. So far as the relations of life are concerned, he is constantly either voluntarily or involuntarily detaching himself from all around, and becoming an insulated being. He retires from the bar, the pulpit, the senate chamber, the exchange. He withdraws from business, and makes preparations to pass his houses and lands into the hands of others. He has no powers now to be cultivated in which the world feels any interest; he has no passions to be restrained, from whose development the world would have anything to dread, he can form no plan stretching into future years, on which the world would look with either hope or fear. He will indeed be respected if he is virtuous, but he will not be feared if he is wicked; and whether one or the other, the weapon which strikes in favor of virtue or vice, will be like that in the hand of the aged Priam—telum imbelle sine leut.

We may love him as a father, venerate him as a sage, honor him for his past services, or pity him on account of his infirmities; but we cease to rely on his arm in the defence of his country, or his eloquent voice in favor of a righteous cause; and we cease to dread him as a foe.

Not so, however, with a young man. Every thing is passing into his hands. The key of every ware-house, of every bank, and of every insurance office, every professor's chair, every deed, and every bond and mortgage; all the endowments of mind, of colleges and asylums; our libraries, our dwellings, our farms, our gardens; all the offices of the township and the nation; all the enterprises of national improvement, and all the plans of benevolence—fruits of many prayers of thoughtful wisdom—all these things are soon to be committed to young men. In every pulsation of the heart of a young man, therefore; in every plan he forms, in the developement of every feeling and purpose, the community has the deepest interest. When the eye is dim with age, and the frame is weak and palsied, if there is anything that will kindle up that eye with momentary brilliancy, or inspire that frame, it is the hope that the coming generation will not be unworthy to receive a trust so dear to a departing Christian and patriot. So the aged patriarch Jacob, when he was borne down under a weight of years, and he felt that he was about to die, assembled his sons around him, and, animated by the prospect before them, his departing soul was stirred within him. He pronounced his benediction in the language of the loftiest prophetic inspiration; committed to them the great interests of truth and of religion, and, having made an end of commanding his sons, he gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered peacefully unto his people.

THE EARLIEST AND BEST EDUCATOR.

"What is wanting," said Napoleon, one day, to Madame Campan, "in order that the youth of France be well educated?" "Good mothers," was the reply. The Emperor was most forcibly struck with the answer. "Here," said he is a system of education in one word." Let the mind of this parent be imbued with knowldge, and her children will imbibe from her the love of learning; let her heart be filled with the affection of God, and her children will receive from her the love of virtue and of noble deeds. How often has she planted germs which, in subsequent years, expanded and produced the fairest fruits of science and of wisdom! The culture of the religious affections, the development of the sense of duty and of the moral nature—this is the great business of life. And to whom has God entrusted the commencement of this solemn work? On whom does it devolve to call forth the infant man? Where is the influence that shall keep the young heart from fatal wanderings and errors? It is the mother to whom we look for the discharge of these momentous effects. If she neglects to do it, there remains no substitute—none to whom we can turn to excite, purify, and foster its immortal faculties. Who is that mother who thinks lightly of her influence on the minds of her children? Let her know that on her it may now be depending, whether a son is to pass through life ignorant of the world, of his duties as a man, a citizen, and a Christian, or be so educated as to be a blessing to his country, an honor to his race, and heir to a glorious immortality. [School Friend.

SIMPLICITY IN THE PULPIT.

It is related of that good man, and distinguished divine, John Wesley, that on one occasion he addressed a body of children, at a Sunday School, for a quarter of an hour, in an interesting discourse, composed of words of one syllahle—an excellent pattern, which might be profitably copied by preachers. How many clergymen in the pulpit, as well as lecturers in our Sabbath and other schools, are in the habit of addressing their audiences in language altogether unsuited to their capacity! And how many preachers deliver learned and well written discourses, which are unsuited to the time, the place, and the audience! We recollect of having, a number of years ago, heard a discourse preached before a body of some two or three hundred sailors, who were on the eve of proceeding to sea on a long cruise, and it was deemed advisable that they should listen to wise and pious monitions from the pulpit, before they embarked on their perilous voyage. But this sermon, instead of containing some excellent practical rules of piety and morality, which they could understand, and advice calculated to be of service to them here and hereafter, consisted of a learned, logical, and metaphysical exposition of the doctrines of the atonement, couched in language and embodying ideas incomprehensible to all who were not deeply versed in theological subjects. Such a sermon was not calculated to benefit the hearers, or to increse their love for religion. Our public speakers, generally, are sadly deficient in simplicity, and thus voluntarily dispense with a powerful aid.

Our Saviour spoke in parables—the multitudes which he addressed were composed of the masses of the people, and his words and his style were adapted to their comprehension. He enlisted their attention, and thus reached their hearts. The Sermon on the Mount and the Lord's Prayer are everlasting models of beauty, simplicity, and power, which should never be lost sight of. [Boston Journal.

NO UNDER-GROUND RAILROAD TO HEAVEN.

The religion of Christ is a visible religion; His church a visible church; its members visible members. This visibility is an important feature of Christian piety, while its seat is in the heart, the vital and moving power there, there must be a profession, a manifestation. This grows not out of any authority or command, but from the very nature of the principle. It is here, and you cannot hide it; it goes forth, and will go forth. It is light, and you cannot make it dark; you may, indeed, light your candle and put it under a bushel; but if you put it on a candlestick, it will give light to all who are in the house. Such is its nature—the rays will flow from the centre, and it is folly to expect anything else. It follows, that if a person is a Christian, the world will find it out; if he have true faith in his heart, this faith will cause him to do something by which he will be exposed and known. There is, then, no such thing as having Christ's religion to ourselves—no going masked to heaven, no night passage there; no tunneled, underground road to that place. We are aware, there are those who love to talk about religion as something altogether between their own souls and God. They tell us that they do not put it on their foreheads, nor write it on their garments. And we ask, who does approve of ostentation in such matters? But we say, if it be so, always and every where a hidden thing, it is a dead thing. If you keep it thus a secret, it is because you are ashamed of it—ashamed to have it known. We infer this both from the nature of the principle, and from the teaching of the great Author. He that confesseth me before men, him will I confess. Here is the test: if you have it, you will show it; if you show it not, you have it not. If there is nothing seen, there is nothing inside. [Bible Repos.

CHEERFULNESS.

The highest achievement of moral philosophy is, to rise above the cares, vexations, and disappointments of life; and the tendency of religion, resting upon a divine basis, buoys the true Christian above the evils that surround him, and inspires him with moral fortitude and vigor to battle with every calamity, and to maintain an unruffled spirit amid the billows and conflicting currents which agitate the ocean of human existence. If the hurricane rages, instead of yielding to its fury, and giving way to despondency, he exerts every energy to ward off danger, and strives to look forward, indulging a soothing hope that the future will be less disastrous than the present. This method of encountering the evils to which every body in a greater or less degree is exposed, deprives disappointment of its sting, is an antidote to the poison of slander, and begets a spirit of cheerfulness which is essential to happiness. He is like the eagle which, when clouds overspread the earth, rises above them, to enjoy the sunshine. No matter how prosperous an individual may be in his pecuniary, domestic, and social relations—if he suffer his spirit to be discomposed by trifling annoyances, he is a stranger to enjoyment, and every day of his life is embittered by some petty cause of vexation, which his own morbid disposition magnifies into a serious calamity. On the other hand, overwhelming must be the misfortune, which can prostrate a man that has been disciplined to patient endurance, and habituated himself to a uniform cheerfulness of mind.

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE.

How few the women who are disposed to turn to good account the influence they may acquire over men! Indeed, most women are incapable of doing so. Furnished by nature with no sympathies for man's higher aspirations, they shrink from purposes they cannot comprehend, and whose pursuit competes with their affection; and thus, as the bracelets of the Sabines slew Tarpeia, the love that should have adored, crushes him. Then of the few who naturally respond to man's loftier aims, most are too timid to encourage them. They conceive their soft dominion is put in jeopardy by the admission to his heart of such formidable competitors as ambition, general benevolence, or the like. They do not understand that lofty desires and a life of earnest action are the best allies of love. As the heart becomes noble, its love becomes nobler also; deeply and truly it cannot love, unless it aspires too. Thus, most women fail of their mission. They regard the love they waken as an end; they do not look upon it as a means to make man a nobler being. They are sent to make us not so much lovers as heroes; and some such there are, of that rare order to which belonged Lady Elizabeth Hastings, of whom Congreve said, that "to love her was a liberal education." [Bentley's Mis.

HOW TO MAKE A CHURCH MISERLY.—Keep out all agents—set your face against all contributions—complain of the extravagance of missionaries—keep away from the monthly concert lest you should be called upon to give something for the support of missions—and the heart of such a church will soon become as unfeeling as a rock. It is a fact worthy of being remembered, that those churches who give the most frequently, not only give the most in amount, but are the most benevolent—they love to give.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, June 22, 1848.

THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Central Association held its session this year with the Church in Lincklaen, Chenango Co., N. Y., commencing on fourth-day, June 7, and closing on the following first-day. Nearly all of the ministers residing within the bounds of the Association were present, together with a considerable number of brethren from the various churches. From several of the feeble churches, however, there were no delegates. From the Eastern Association there were two delegates, Lucius Crandall and Geo. B. Utter; from the Western Association one, Thomas E. Babcock.

The Introductory Discourse was preached by Eld. Russell G. Burdick, from 1 Cor. 1: 10—"Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name af our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment." The aim of the preacher was to show the importance of union among brethren, the possibility of attaining it, and the means to be used for the purpose.

After the discourse, the following officers were reported by a Committee, and elected by the Association, viz:—

Moderator—ELI S. BAILEY, of 2d Brookfield Church.
Rec. Sec.—EPH. MAXSON, of 3d Brookfield Church.
Ass't Rec. Sec.—J. B. WELLS, of DeRuyter Church.

State of the Churches.

The letters from the churches did not give a very flattering account of their condition. In a few instances, it is true, cheering revivals were reported; but in others there have been no revivals, while difficulties have served to distract and weaken them. One church reported serious trouble from secret societies and the peculiar views entertained by some in relation to Slavery. Another has been disturbed by a case of discipline with which fault was found. We believe, however, that the whole number of members reported was about the same as last year.

Missionary Operations.

There are several feeble churches within the bounds of this Association needing constant aid from aboad, among which are the Otselic, Newport, and Diana churches. Two or three years ago, as the readers of the Recorder probably know, they were all supplied with preaching to a considerable extent by means raised through the Association, and paid in principally at a semi-annual meeting held for the special purpose of attending to missionary business. A notion became prevalent, however, that there were too many meetings to be attended, and consequently the semi-annual meeting was given up. The result has been a decrease of missionary funds and labor. During the past year only a small amount has been contributed, and that has been expended for labor in Otselic, and a missionary tour performed by Eld. Russell G. Burdick in Oswego, Lewis, Jefferson, and St. Lawrence counties. The leading brethren in the Association seem determined that better things shall be done in the coming year. They agreed to hold a semi-annual meeting for missionary purposes, at Scott, on the third day of the week before the second Sabbath in January, 1849. They also resolved to employ Eld. Enoch Barns to supply the Church at Diana one-quarter of the coming year, and Eld. S. B. Crandall to labor six months at Otselic, and visit the Church at Newport once a month.

Civil Protection of Sabbath-keepers.

It is doubtless known to most of our readers, that the churches in the State of New York have repeatedly petitioned the Legislature to extend to Sabbath-keepers the same privileges and immunities on the seventh day of the week as others enjoy on the first day. But this has not yet been granted them. The last Legislature passed a law, which protects them on the Sabbath against processes issued from a Justice's Court, and makes it a misdemeanor for any man to take advantage of their peculiar views and prosecute them on the Sabbath day. Still they are liable to be taken upon processes issued from higher courts, and may suffer all the inconveniences in those courts to which they were ever exposed, and that even after the Legislature has acknowledged the justice of their claim to protection. This subject was brought before the Association, and after a full discussion of it, Eld. Wm. B. Maxson was appointed a Committee to prepare a petition to the Legislature of New York, setting forth our right, as observers of the seventh day of the week, to enjoy the same privileges and immunities on that day as other denominations enjoy on the first day. This petition, when prepared, is to be published in the Sabbath Recorder, and a copy of it forwarded to each church within the bounds of the Association.

Publication Interests.

Among the committees appointed at the commencement of the session, was one on Publications. They reported, "That the utility of publishing books, tracts, and papers, as a means of promoting the cause of truth, urges us to recommend to the churches and individual members of the Association that they do what they are able to aid the American Sabbath Tract Society, to introduce or extend the use of our new Hymn Book among our people, and to increase the circulation and patronage of the Sabbath Recorder throughout our denomination and the community at large." The adoption of this report was followed by a statement of the manner in which our publications are now carried on, and an explanation of the plan for a Publishing Establishment which was presented to the Eastern Association, and brought to the attention of this Association through a resolution requesting the appointment of three delegates to meet others at New Market, N. J., in September next. After considerable deliberation upon the subject, the following delegates were appointed: James Bailey, Wm. B. Maxson, Eli S. Bailey.

Resolutions.

A portion of the last day of the session was employed in an exceedingly interesting discussion of several resolutions presented by the Business Committee. Had we notes sufficiently full to give the reader some idea of the thoughts presented, we would very gladly do so. But as we have not, we must content ourselves with publishing the resolutions, simply remarking that they were advocated with much earnestness and ability by various persons, and unanimously adopted by the Association.

Resolved, That the American Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, in its efforts to promulgate the gospel of truth among the heathen in foreign lands, claims the vigorous support of the churches composing this Association.

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend to the churches composing this body to take up a monthly collection for missionary purposes; and also that they faithfully observe a concert of prayer in behalf of our missionary operations, in the afternoon of the first Sabbath in each month.

Resolved, That the churches of this Association ought to cherish with interest the objects and labors of the American Sabbath Tract Society.

Resolved, That in view of the importance of family worship, and the alarming extent to which it is neglected by the disciples of Christ, the faithful labors of pastors and ministers are called for to correct the evil.

Whereas, it is the opinion of this Association, that religion is not advanced by legislative enactments imposing pains and penalties for the non-performance of religious observances; and whereas, such legislation is, in our opinion, opposed to the free exercise of religious profession and worship, and the right of private opinion; therefore—

Resolved, That it is the duty of Christians to labor for the repeal of all laws enforcing religious observances.

Resolved, That Secret Societies, such as Odd-Fellows and Sons of Temperance, are not in accordance with the Gospel of Christ, and that this body would recommend to the churches to hold no fellowship with adhering members of such societies.

The foregoing account embraces the principal items of business of general interest transacted by the Association. Of course there were some other things done to carry out the plans formed last year, as well as those formed this year; but leaving the plans, we presume our readers will generally be satisfied without our going more into details. We will only add, that the ministers of the Association were appointed a committee to attend any Sunday or Lord's-day Conventions which may be held within the bounds of the Association; Eld. Varnum Hull was appointed a delegate to the Western Association, and Eld. Eli S. Bailey a delegate to the annual meeting of the Missionary Association; resolutions were also passed to continue correspondence with the South-Western Association, and to open a correspondence with the Wisconsin Association. The difficulties in the Church at Preston, (which were brought before the Association at its last session as well as the present,) occupied considerable time, and were disposed of in a way which it is hoped will prove satisfactory to all parties. EVANGELICAL BOOKS IN MEXICO.—Almost simultaneously with the arrival of the news of the ratification of the treaty of peace by the Mexican Congress, cheering intelligence comes from the soldiers of the cross in that benighted country. Colporteurs in the employ of the American Tract Society at Tampico and Jalapa, we understand, write that they find the Mexicans not only eager to obtain books and pay for them, but even among the most abject classes they discover with the young, an ability to read, which has caused most agreeable surprise. At Tampico, where Mexicans were living in the poorest huts, they found many who joyfully received books and tracts; at Jalapa, in the market place before the great cathedral, the colporteurs could hardly supply the demand. All were eager to pay for some kind of book or tract, and two priests bought copies of all the Spanish publications he had for sale. The colporteurs say they have nothing to fear, unless the priests should start some popular prejudice against them, which God can overrule and prevent.

JEWS IN EUROPE.—The Prussian Universal Gazette gives the following statistical account of the Jewish population of Europe: England and Ireland, 13,000, being only the 2,067th part of the whole population; Belgium, 1,954, the 2,157th of the whole population; Sweden and Norway, 850, the 5,012th of the population; Denmark, 6,000, the 356th part of the population; France, 70,000, the 487th part of the population; the Netherlands, 52,000, the 61st part of the population; in Russia, including the Asiatic portion, the Jews form the 56th part of the population. The States of Austria, 641,000, being the 57th part of the population; in Italy, with the exception of the Austrian provinces, 40,000; Germany, not including Austria and Prussia, 175,000; Prussia, 222,814, being about a 74th part of the population.

THE CHRISTIAN NINISTRY.—NO. 2.

PIETY A REQUISITE.

That true piety is indispensible to the office of the Christian ministry, is evident from the nature of the office itself, inasmuch as it is designed "to open men's eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light and from the power of satan unto God; that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among them which are sanctified." Several considerations may be alledged why true piety is the first and an indispensable requisite to entrance upon the Christian ministry. 1. The object being the inculcation of holiness, none but he who possesses a good share of it can be supposed to teach it. Even should he know the theory, the theory alone serves not; he must reach the heart, therefore his own heart needs to know its power. 2. Piety is the offspring of divine influences; how, therefore, shall he teach or enforce their necessity, who has never felt their power? The instrumentalities must accord to the mind of the great moving power—the divine Agent. It is not to be supposed that he will sanction any other instrumentality than such as he approves. True piety is, therefore, essentially requisite to the enjoyment and approval of the Holy Spirit. 3. True piety is essential to a due approval of divine things, and an adequate apprehension of the doctrines of the gospel. Without a renewed heart, who discerneth and approveth spiritual things—things spiritually discerned? A purified heart is a better guide to spiritual truth than the most perspicacious intellect without it. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him;" and "he that doeth the will of God shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." 4. Without piety a minister can never obtain that love or confidence of the godly which is requisite to happiness in his labors, and success in his undertakings. Can the truly godly ever approve, love, or confide, in a character which is not only devoid of adaptation, but is as a lie upon the very profession itself? Piety must extend to the spirit of our words and actions. Fervor in speaking upon sacred things is as requisite to conviction, as correctness of theory; so that without holy feeling the minister can never reach the object of his office. This is a quality which cannot be successfully counterfeited. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." 5. Deep-seated, unaffected piety is requisite to enable a man to bear the trials and encounter the difficulties attendant upon this arduous office; nothing else can convert its duties into pleasures; nothing but piety can uniformly enlist the full energies of the intellect, or the strongest affections of the heart in duties to which the mass of mankind are indifferent, and for which the world offers no adequate temporal compensation. It were better to be a hewer of wood or a drawer of water, than a Christian minister without piety. Better perform any of the drudgeries of secular life, than undertake a spiritual office without spiritual qualifications. S. D.

SOUTHERN BAPTIST BOARD OF MISSIONS.

The New York Recorder gives extracts from the Third Annual Report of the Southern Baptist Board of Foreign Missions. We learn from it that the receipts for the last year have been $19,214 09, which with $12,194 88 on hand at the commencement of the year makes a total of $31,708 97. The expenditures for the year have amounted to $16,835 82, leaving a balance in the Treasurer's hands of $14,875 15. Deducting from this sum the amount specially designated for a chapel in Canton, which we suppose cannot for the present be built, a balance for general purposes remains of $7,500. There has been an increase of receipts during the year. The Board has missionaries as follows: Canton, Revs. I. J. Roberts, George Pearcy, Francis C. Johnson; Mrs. Pearcy, Mrs. Clopton (returned;) five native assistants—total, ten. Shanghai, Revs. J. L. Shuck, T. W. Tobey, M. T. Yates, J. S. James, M. D., missionary and physician; Mrs. Shuck, Mrs. Tobey, Mrs. Yates, Mrs. James; two native preachers—total, ten. Africa, Revs. John Day, F. S. James, A. P. Davis, B. J. Drayton, S. Pervis; J. Elkins, teacher—total, six. The total number of missionaries and assistants under the patronage of the Southern Board is twenty-six.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Will you, or some of your correspondents, please give through the medium of the Recorder an answer to the following inquiry, viz: Can a course of conduct be pursued, an act committed, aside from fornication or adultery, so criminal in its nature as to destroy the marriage covenant, or so to release the innocent from that covenant as to give him or her a moral right to marry again. AN INQUIRER AFTER TRUTH.

◆

THE NEW ENGLAND NUN.—A Cincinnati correspondent of the New York Evangelist says that Mary P. Thompson, the young lady about whose conversion to the Catholic faith, and whose entrance into a nunnery, so much stir was made, with a view to the injury of the Board of National Popular Education, has left the convent, and it is said, absconded with another nun.

◆

A BISHOP'S BULL.—The Puritan says that the Evangelical Episcopalians have formed a voluntary society, ostensibly for publishing books, but mainly to embody an influence against the Puseyism of their denomination. A convention was called, to form an auxiliary to this society in Rochester, and Dr. DeLancey, the Bishop of the diocese, issued a pastoral letter, so-called, denouncing the attempt. Either the Bishop usurps powers that are not given him by his Church, or his system is a rank despotism.

DIVIDING THE WORD OF TRUTH.

"Rightly dividing the Word of Truth." 2 Timothy 2: 15.

It will be a glorious day for the churches of God when his word shall be rightly divided to those that hear, when ministers and editors shall apply each expression of Scripture to its appropriate theme, and each sentence according to its true purport. The pure and beautiful plumage of truth would then no longer deck the form of error, nor the unhallowed robe of detestable beasts draw down upon truth the derision and scorn of the multitude. To pervert the language of the sacred Scriptures is to destroy divine testimony, and when done even to the support of truth, is an evil of no small magnitude; for, besides destroying the consistency of God's testimony, and thus dishonoring the Almighty, it seriously affects the soundness of the believer's faith, and consequently obscures the light of truth among men. It is appropriating the words of inspiration, which were designed by the all-wise God for the instruction and edification of his people in one department of religious knowledge, to the support of another, and not only superadds needless testimony to such doctrine but subtracts proportionably from the intended means of understanding a more obscure or perhaps a more important truth. If one duty could, by accession of such support, be rendered clearer than it otherwise would appear, the 'exchange might, perhaps, be no robbery;' but the pervertion of Scripture is robbery itself, and, though done in the blindness of men's minds, it does but make them more blind to the true light of life, and to the proper understanding of their duty. The reader will, no doubt, bring to mind many instances of an improper or wrong division in the word of truth, whereby serious errors are maintained in the world. Among them, the wrong division of the commandments of God may be noticed. The Papists expunge one precept and divide another to make the number good again, and thus they sustain idolatry. Others, wrongly divide the fourth precept in such a manner as to separate the Sabbath from the seventh day; and, having thus divided it, they carry it away captive at their will, and made it subservient to the support of a human institution. The vision of St. John, by which he was carried by the Spirit into that great day of the Lord where he saw the stately steppings of the glorious Redeemer in the midst of the seven candlesticks, as described in the 1st chapter of Revelations, is, by some, entirely obscured, by not rightly dividing, the word of truth, but so perverting it as to make the term "Lord's day" sustain a papal festival. The instruction which our Lord intended should be conveyed by laying his hands on the children brought to him, and blessing them, is also perverted and made a plea for the baptism of infants; thus wrongly dividing the word of truth. Had the apostle said, divide and conquer, then verily there would be some consistency between his instruction and the present practice of too many teachers of religion among us. When shall the word of truth be rightly divided, and each have his portion in due season? S.

CONSTANTINOPLE.—The Dayspring says that a new impulse seems to have been given to the spirit of inquiry among the Armenians at Constantinople. The places of worship are crowded on Sunday; and there have been some interesting cases of hopeful conversion to God. On the other hand, the opposition of the Patriarch and his adherents is quite active. He does not hesitate to calumniate the Protestants in his sermons, in order to keep up the excitement against them; and he is supposed to be the secret instigator of various modes of annoyance and injury.

SUASION.—The N. Y. Tribune says, that after preaching till they were tired, to the law-breaking rumsellers of Hanover, N. H., the friends of temperance raised a small fund to cover costs, and brought their cases before the Grand Jury. One was convicted, and fined $80 and costs; another barely escaped by some official sleight-of-hand in preparing his case; and the whole body caved in, and voluntarily came under bonds of $500 each to sell no more liquor so long as the law shall forbid it. Two of them immediately sold out, leaving but one who did sell, and he has given it up.

SAILING OF MISSIONARIES.—We learn from the Providence Journal, that the following missionaries were to sail from that port on Tuesday, for Africa, in the brig Smithfield, bound for Gaboon River:—Rev. J. M. Preston and wife, Rev. W. T. Wheeler, Mrs. Griswold; also, John Wesley, a native youth, who came to the United States two years since, and has learned the art of printing.

FRANCE.—The Journal of Commerce says:—The Revolution has developed an amount of Protestantism in France which was not supposed to exist. Villages, where before a Protestant could not find a congregation, if allowed to preach at all, have now dismissed their Catholic curates, and called in evangelical ministers. All the religious societies find large fields open to their efforts, which they are prevented from occupying only by the want of pecuniary resources; and the embarrassments of business have made the contributions to their funds less even than before the Revolution. The needed aid, however, is now pouring in from this country and Great Britain, and will doubtless continue to flow with increasing volume.

THE USE OF FOG.—Perhaps some of our friends, who may be so unfortunate as to reside remote from a sea-port, would like to know why it is often so very foggy in such places. We must confess that until reading the following in the Western Recorder, we were not aware that it was sent for the purpose of forcing men to the sabbatical observance of Sunday. We know not whether our readers will be as apt to appreciate this seasonable interposition as the agents of the line of steamships seem to have been:—

"It was advertised that the American Atlantic steamer Washington would leave New York for Liverpool on the 20th of February. When it was found that the 20th was the Sabbath, not only Christians, but the secular newspapers remonstrated. The agent said he had no authority to make the change, and so she must leave on Sunday. The morning arrived, and at 8 o'clock the Washington left the dock. In the meanwhile, such a dense fog rose and obscured the city and harbor, that it was impossible for her to move with safety. After going a short distance, she dropped her anchors off Castle Garden, and remained there during the day. The next morning the sun rose in a clear, bright atmosphere, and the 'Washington' once more started successfully from her moorings on her voyage. It has since been officially announced, that no more steamers of this line will sail on Sunday."

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN THE FRENCH COLONIES.—The Paris Moniteur of the 3d of May publishes a series of documents and decrees relative to the immediate emancipation of the blacks in the French colonies. The following are some of the proposed improvements:—

Elementary free schools for the children, of both sexes, are to be established in every district, to which fathers, mothers, or guardians shall be obliged to send their children, under a penalty of 15 days' imprisonment. Independently of these, a normal school of arts and manufactures is to be opened in each colony, and a lyceum in Guadaloupe. National work-houses are likewise to be established in the colonies, and all individuals without labor will find employment in them on certain conditions. Mendicity and vagrancy are to be punished by three to six months' imprisonment. Savings banks on the plan of those in France are to be founded in the colonies, under the guarantee of the Republic and the surveillance of the Administration. The Commissioners General shall proceed to make a new assessment of the personal tax which the citizens may pay by three days' labor. Each year a "feast of labor" will be celebrated with the greatest pomp in the different towns of the colony, and the laborer, male or female, who shall have distinguished himself by good conduct shall receive a premium of 200f. or 30 perches of arable land. The number of the colonial representatives of the people in the National Assembly is to be three for Martinique, three for Guadaloupe, one for Guyana, two for the Island of the Reunion, one for Senegal, and one for the East India settlements. The colonial councils are suppressed. The censorship of the journals and other publications is abolished, and newspapers may in future be printed and published without any previous authorization. The laws relative to recruitment and the National Guard are to be in vigor in the colonies.

ASSAULT ON MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.—The Evening Post publishes an account of an outrage near Shanghai, taken from the Friend of China of March 22, the particulars of which we copy:—

On the 8th of March, three missionaries, Messrs. Medhurst, Lockhart, and Muirhead, went on a journey to Tsing-poo, about twenty-seven miles from Shanghai, to distribute tracts, and while doing so were molested by a party of grain-junk men, and after they left Tsing-poo on their return, by another party of junk men, armed with poles, crow-bars, swords, and other weapons, one of them with a heavy iron chain. Having overtaken the missionaries, they fell upon them furiously, whereupon Messrs. Medhurst and Muirhead ran for their lives, but Mr. Lockhart was thrown down and badly beaten by the fellow who carried the chain. His two companions after running some distance and finding him absent, returned to his rescue, but before they reached him, he had succeeded in getting upon his feet, and ran. The pursuit was renewed for some miles, and being overtaken again, the party were much maltreated. Whilst warding off the blows as well as he could, Mr. Medhurst was struck from behind, with the butt end of a toothed hoe, the blow of which immediately stunned him, and he fell flat on the ground; the by-standers then came up and struck him a number of times, while lying on his face; among the rest, one gave him a severe blow with a sword on the side of the knee. The other missionaries were eqully ill-treated, Mr. Muirhead being so much beat about the the legs that he was scarcely able to walk, and Mr. Lockhart received a severe wound on the back of the head, which bled profusely. The marauders, having beaten the unfortunate men to their satisfaction, proceeded to plunder them, and this done, they were ordered back to the city, repeated blows being given on any indication of unwillingness to proceed. As they urged them along, they declared they would not let them go under $5,000 a head, but on nearing the city, all of them slunk away, their places being supplied by officers of the city, by whom they were conducted before a magistrate, who received them kindly, promised reparation, and gave them an escort home. These junk men are a portion of a class who have, by a recent change in the mode of transporting the tribute-grain to Pekin, been thrown out of employment; and they have resorted to plunder to sustain themselves, as well as to intimidate the Government. The British Consul at Shanghai has taken up the matter officially, and will investigate it thoroughly.

LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship America arrived last week, being only 10 days and 8 hours from dock to dock, the shortest passage across the Atlantic on record. The most important item of news she brings is the sentencing of John Mitchell. He is to be sent to Bermuda for fourteen years. This act of the British Government has perhaps done more towards the liberation of Ireland than anything that Mitchell could accomplish. His wife and family have been adopted by the Repeal Association. No serious commotion has taken place in France; but the National Assembly still holds its sessions under the guardianship of several thousand soldiers. The Committee on the Constitution has decided on a single president, and a single chamber, both to be elected directly by the people, and by universal suffrage. The chamber is to consist of 750 members. The dismissal of Sir L. Bulwer from the Court of Spain, is decided by the Government to have been without sufficient cause. The Prussian Government seems determined to exterminate the Poles. Notwithstanding they make a gallant resistance, yet they are met by armies of ten to one and butchered like wild animals.

CONGRESSIONAL.—With President-making, attending ratification meetings, making stump-speeches, &c., Congress has managed to get through the last two weeks without the accomplishment of much business, except the consideration and passage of some bills of little general interest.

EFFORTS FOR FREEDOM.—The Rochester American, in a letter from Augusta, Ga., gives the following noble instance of man struggling to be free:—

The talk of the town to-day is the departure of Frank Shadwick, a self-emancipated slave, his wife and children, to seek a more congenial home in the State of Pennsylvania. This slave, who is a native of this beautiful city, began his work of emancipation by purchasing his time from year to year, at about $100 per annum—the usual hire for a good servant. Possessing great energy and much intelligence, with perfect integrity, he could both overseer other slaves and labor well himself, and very justly commanded his wages. His surplus earnings soon bought him horses and drays, and enabled him to hire good servants of such as had them to spare. Thus established in business, in the course of 15 years he has made money enough to buy himself at about $1,000, to pay a large sum for his wife and children, and to take to Harrisburg three or four thousand dollars besides. Some ten or twelve of the first men in Augusta united in giving him a letter of high commendation. It was with pain and reluctance that Frank left his troops of friends and the scenes of his childhood. The only motive was the lawful education of his children—an advantage denied them by the laws of Georgia.

MORE LYNCHING IN VICKSBURG.—We learn from the Whig that the city of Vicksburg has again been disgraced by one of those scenes of lawless brutality for which it is somewhat celebrated. It seems that there had been an unusual number of burglaries committed of late, and among other depredations of the kind a wharf boat of Porterfield & Whaley was robbed of $400. A man by the name of Robinson was suspected of the last named robbery, and was taken up by several persons and threatened with hanging if he did not confess the theft and refund the stolen property. At first Robinson said the money could be found in a cabin below the race track, where, on examination, it was not found. He then declared that it had been stolen by a John McQuade, who was waked up, taken out of bed, and whipped nearly to death, all the while alledging his innocence. After being whipped McQuade was brought into the presence of Robinson, when the latter denied all knowledge of the former, and confessed that he had implicated McQuade merely in order to gain time and save himself.

THE CLIMATE OF MEXICO.—The climate of Mexico is peculiar, beautiful, calm, and serene; but the atmosphere has so much less oxygen in it than ours that the whole economy of life is changed. The pulsation is increased almost double in frequency, and there is a want of that vigor and robust feeling which our climate affords a healthy man, and once reduced by disease there, it is almost impossible to regain health and strength. The mornings are cool, too cool, for a man in a relaxed state of health to exercise without danger of taking cold, which is almost as bad as any other disease there; and the days are so hot that the rays of the sun cannot be borne without producing fever. The natives wrap up in cloaks in the morning and retire at noon.

MANUFACTURE OF PINS.—Brown & Elton, of Waterbury, Conn., have an improved machine for the manufacture of pins, in operation, which turns out two barrels of pins per day. A barrel contains 4,000,000 pins; consequently 8,000,000 are manufactured each day, or 48,000,000 a week. The machine is perfect and simple in its operations. The wire is run into the machine from a reel, cut to the requisite length, pointed, headed, and made a finished pin by one operation. From this machine they fall into the hopper, or the sticking machine, as it is called, in which they are arranged and stuck upon the papers, and come out perfect, only requiring to be packed to be ready for market. So says the Scientific American.

ALARM IN MARTINIQUE.—The brig Columbus, Capt. Webster, which arrived at this port yesterday from Martinique, brought a number of passengers who were till lately among the most wealthy planters on the island. They were obliged to leave in consequence of the late revolt of the slaves. Great excitement still prevails among all the white inhabitants, who take refuge on board of all foreign vessels which they can reach. Business was very dull, there being no sale for American produce.

SUMMARY.

Our readers will remember the case of the slave husband and father who murdered his wife and child a few days since in the Covington, Ky., jail, and then cut his own throat, rather than endure the horrors of slavery in the rice swamps and sugar plantations of Carolina and Louisana. Well, it seems that the purchaser of these slaves has commenced a suit against the person of whom he purchased them, on the ground that the bargain was not completed—the slaves having died before he took possession of them. On the other hand, as the contract was to place the slaves in Covington jail, the original owner will insist that they passed out of his hands, and were in fact in possession of the purchaser the moment they were placed in that jail.

Aaron S. Pennington, Esq., to whom was referred the several claims for the reward offered by the Newark Banking and Insurance Company, for the recovery of the money and checks lost by the President of the institution, has awarded $1,879 21, being the proportion of the sum offered for the amount recovered, to James A. Perrine, George Woolsey, and Joseph Jenkins, they being the persons who returned the money to the Bank; and Mr. Perrine being the furniture dealer to whom the colored woman passed some of the money on the same day it was stolen.

"Two or three weeks since," says the Boston Courier, "an actor in one of our theatres was buttoning up a pair of tights, to go on in his part, when he felt something prick him under the waist band. He threw them off as soon as possible, when a large black spider fell upon the floor, which he killed. The poison of the wound spread over a surface of several inches, causing sickness, and the detention of the performer from his duties ever since; but, by judicious medical treatment, he is recovering."

We find in the Telegraph the official census from the several Counties of Texas generally, down to the beginning of the present year. The total results for the whole country are as follows: Electors or voters 22,013; white males under 18 years 27,814; white male over 18 and under 45 years 25,148; white males over 45 years 4,899; white females 45,099; slaves 38,753; free colored persons 295. Total white population, 102,961. Total white and colored population of all Texas, 142,009.

A daring and foolhardy young man, named Hosea Hollenbrook, who was ambitious to become another Sam Patch, leaped over Genesee Falls at Rochester on the evening of the 15th inst. Up to the last accounts his body had not been found. He had made an arrangement with some of his shopmates to help him out of the water below the Falls, as he could not swim, and made the leap for the mere purpose of showing his courage, in the belief, if successful, he would make a speculation on the 4th of July.

The Westminster (Md.) Carroltonian says: "Many of our farmers say that the grain never looked more promising, particularly the wheat, though in one or two instances we have heard that the rye is suffering slightly from the rust, occasioned most probably by the heavy fall of dew some few weeks since. The late rains have been of much benefit to the corn and potatoe crops, which were almost suffering from the long drought."

The schr. Pacific, Capt. Gilman, from Gonaives 29th ult., arrived at Boston on the 13th. Capt. G. reports all quiet at Gonaives, received by the way of Port-au-Prince, that the French Consul at Aux Cayes had been beaten by a rabble of blacks, who were jealous of his interference for the protection of the mulattoes. It was supposed at Gonaives, that if this news was true, the French fleet, daily expected, would demand ample reparation in the matter.

A laboring man named Mr. Murphy, was recently killed in Diamond Alley, by the unexpected explosion of a blast in which he was engaged in blowing up. The blast hung fire so long that he supposed it had failed, and incautiously approached and was leaning over it, when the explosion occurred, tearing his head to fragments. He has left a wife and family.

On Sunday night last a fire broke out in the woods in Milton society near the line between Cornwall and Litchfield, Ct., which consumed 200 or 300 acres of forest and several hundred cords of wood, which had been prepared for coaling. The wood and woodland belonged to the Cornwall Iron Company. The fire originated from a coal pit. The loss is immense though not definitely ascertained.

It is stated that the steamer America, in her recent wonderful trip from Liverpool, experience a slight detention from the following cause: During the passage, a vessel was seen in the distance with signals of distress flying. Capt. Judkins immediately bore down toward her, and when within hailing distance, found it to be a Dutch bark, the skipper of which inquired the news about the war in Mexico.

During the night of the 5th there was a series of fires in Pittsburgh, one of which destroyed the public school house on Irvine street, besides injuring Mr. Fehl's new tavern, and consuming three large stables, in which four horses perished. On the evening of the 6th another stable was destroyed, and a horse and a cow burned.

The final reports of the building committee and architect of the Girard College, state that the entire sum expended in its construction, is $1,933,821 78, and that the great rooms on which the greater portion of this sum was expended, are wholly unfit for the use for which they were intended.

There are 218 newspapers published in Pennsylvania, exclusive of miscellaneous publications. This, we believe, exceeds the number published in any other State in the Union. Ohio boast of 174, and New York of about 200.

Mr. Palmer, late of Indiana, who has explored the country north of the Columbia river, says that Vancouver's Island is as large as Great Britain, and contains all the natural resources to make it the seat of empire of a great nation.

Two fishermen lately caught at Milwaukie in their nets some 10 miles from the shore, the largest trout ever caught in those parts. It measured 3 feet 11 inches in length, and 45 inches in girth, and weighed fifty-five pounds.

We learn from Jerome's Express, that on the 12th inst., the steamer Penobscot ran into the schooner Brandywine, of Bangor, from Boston for Bangor, and sunk her immediately. The The Brandywine had an assorted cargo. It is not known whether either vessel or cargo were insured. It is thought that the vessel will be raised. Every exertion was made on board the steamer to avoid the collision, but the tide was too strong. No lives were lost.

A house in the village of Vesper, N. Y., was set on fire on Friday, 9th inst., by two small boys, while the parents were absent, by playing with some shavings. One of the lads ran to tell his mother, who was at a nighbor's. The other, an interesting little fellow, about 5 years old, ran up stairs, and was consumed by the flames, with the building. His name was Ferris.

The Belfast (Me.) papers state that on the 20th ult., an explosion was heard in the air, and two men saw a stone fall to the ground. They went to it, and found it to be hard like flint, but with a strong sulphur scent; it was as large as a hen's egg. It was found at Castine, although the sound was heard thirty miles off.

According to the Boston Journal, the first day of summer was actually colder in that vicinity than the first day of January last. The thermometer on the first day of January indicated a uniform temperature of fifty-eight degrees at sunrise, noon, and sunset, while on the first of June, the temperature was forty-four degrees at sunrise, fifty-six degrees at noon, and fifty-seven at sunset.

The steamboats Sultana and Gray Eagle came into collision on the 11th inst., when near Island No. 35, St. Louis. So violent was the collision that the connecting pipe of the Gray Eagle was broken and the boiler displaced. The rush of steam from the broken pipe killed one man and severely scalded five others. One man was knocked overboard by the collision and drowned.

The Catholic Church situated at the junction of York and Lafayette sts., New Haven, was consumed by fire on Sunday night, 11th inst. Most of the altar and other church furniture was saved. HOPKINTON, R. I., June 12, 1848.

NOTICE.

Whereas, the Eastern Seventh-day Baptist Association, at its last Annual Session, resolved to hold correspondence through messengers, or its Corresponding Secretary, with her sister Associations, and believing that they would act in concert with us relative to the subject of family prayer, which particularly engaged the deliberations of that body I have deemed it expedient to give publicity in this way to those resolutions which were adopted relative to that subject:

Resolved, That we consider it the duty of every Christian who sustains the responsible relation of the head of a family, to maintain the regular and daily worship of God in his own house; and that the neglect of this duty is a deplorable feature in the character of those professors of religion who are guilty of it, calling for the earnest labors of pastors and ministers to correct the evil.

Resolved, That we recommend pastors and ministers to lay this subject before their respective congregations on the first Sabbath in July

In behalf of the Eastern Association, I respectfully invite the pastors and ministers of our sister Associations to unite with us on that day in urging the claims of this much-neglected duty; and also to unite with us in earnestly imploring the blessing of Abraham's God (in whom all the families of the earth are blessed) to descend, and erect an altar in every house, from which the morning and evening incense shall daily ascend until the dew of Hermon descends refreshing and reviving all around.

S. S. GRISWOLD, Cor. Sec.

HOPKINTON, R. I. June 13, 1848.

BY CHARLES MACKAY.

Mighty river, oh! mighty river,
Rolling in ebb and flow forever
Through the city so vast and old;
Through massive bridges—by domes and spires,
Crowned with the smoke of a myriad fires;
City of majesty, power, and gold;
Thou lovest to float on thy waters dull
The white-winged fleets so beautiful,
And the lordly steamers passing along,
Wind-defying, and swift, and strong,
Thou bearest them all on thy motherly breast,
Laden with riches, at trade's behest;
Bounteous trade, whose wine and corn
Stock the garner and fill the horn,
Who gives us luxury, joy, and pleasure,
Stintless, endless, out of measure—
Thou art a rich and mighty river,
Rolling in ebb and flow forever.

Doleful river, oh! doleful river,
Pale on thy breast the moonbeams quiver,
Through the city so drear and cold—
City of sorrows hard to bear,
Of guilt, injustice, and despair—
City of miseries unfold;
Thou hidest below, in thy treacherous waters,
The death-cold form of Beauty's daughters;
The corses pale of the young and sad—
Of the old whom sorrow has goaded mad—
Mothers of babes that cannot know
The sires who left them to their wo—
Women forlorn, and men that run
The race of passion, and die undone;
Thou takest them all in thy careless wave,
And givest them all a ready grave;
Thou art a black and doleful river,
Rolling in ebb and flow forever.

In ebb and flow forever and ever—
So rolls the world, thou murky river,
So rolls the tide, above and below;
Below, with the current, the dead men float:
The waves may smile in the sunny glow,
While above, in the glitter, and pomp, and glare,
The flags of the vessels flap the air;
But below, in the silent under-tide,
The waters vomit the wretch that died;
Above, the sound of the music swells,
From the passing ship, from the city bells;
From below, there cometh a gurgling breath,
As the desperate diver yields to death;
Above and below the waters go,
Bearing their burden of joy or wo;
Rolling along, thou mighty river,
In ebb and flow forever and ever.

SALLY SLY AND JENNY McKEAN.

HUMOROUS REPORT ON BUTTER.

We copy the following report from the Farmer's Monthly Visitor. There is a good moral conveyed in it, told with a rich vein of humor that is capital. It is from the pen of S. B. Little, of the Merrimac (N. H.) Agricultural Society:—

The beneficence of the Creator is manifest in so disposing our tastes, and so adapting these to the varieties with which we are surrounded, as to make life a scene of enjoyment instead of a burden. It might have been that necessary food would have been noisome, so it is sometimes to the diseased stomach, had it not pleased the Creator to have ordered it otherwise. Bread is the staff of life, but butter is given to make it slip down easier and with a better relish. But it depends something on who makes the butter, whether it answer this purpose. Butter made in Joe Bunker's family needs to be eaten in the dark; then to make it pass well, one or two other senses should be laid aside; while that made by his brother Jonathan may be eaten in the full blaze of noon; you would wish that your neck was as long again that you might have the pleasurable sensation of swallowing prolonged. A bit of the history of their better halves will explain the whole matter.

Joe's wife was Sally Sly—when a small girl she was sly—she would not half wash the milk pail, but sly it away and let it sour. She was sly at school and did not half get her lessons, but would have her book in sight when reciting; but as she grew older she learned that to get well married she must appear well, and so she bent all her cunning to get a superficial education in everything, from roasting a potato to playing the piano. Poor Joe fell in love with her, and "love has no eyes," so he married her. But soon after she entered on housekeeping his eye sight came, and he saw his fix, that it was for better or worse," and he thought it was all for worse. Like a true philosopher, he concluded to endure what he could not avoid nor cure, and got along tolerably well only when he came to her butter—for his mother was a real butter maker. Every time he saw or tasted of Sally's butter he felt the horrors. Her manner of making butter was somewhat as follows: she thinks it of no consequence whether the milk pail is sweet or sour—sets the milk in a warm room, because it is easier than to go into the cellar, and if some dirt should blow into the pans she thinks that every man must "eat a peck of dirt," and in no place will it slip down easier than in butter; she lets cream pots be open, and when she churns forgets the poke; leaves the cream nearly at blood heat that it may come quick. When she takes it out of the churn she picks out the bodies of all flies and spiders—the legs and wings are, so small that they can be swallowed. She works out half the buttermilk and sets it away in a warm place for use. Poor Joe has seen so much butter of this kind that he declares butter does not agree with his health, and will not taste it. Yet his wife wonders why he does not try it, and marvels that he does not keep a dairy, and make butter for market.

Jonathan was a younger brother of Joe's, and had occasion to eat at his brother's enough to know why he could not eat butter; he declared he never would marry without knowing what his bread would be buttered with. Following the bent of his fancy, he made several attempts at matrimony, and Julia Juniper almost caught him, for there was always good butter on the table at tea, but he was determined to know who made it. On inquiry, she says, "La me! mother makes the butter; I take lessons on the piano."

"Well," says Jonathan, "I want a wife that takes lessons on the churn—I shall look further."

After several unsuccessful attempts, and just ready to despair, he started in pursuit of stray cattle, before breakfast, and wandered across the forest into the corner of the next town, and weary and hungry he called at a decent looking house and asked for some refreshment, which was most cordially granted, for the family were what were called Scotch Irish—in religion Presbyterian, and in hospitality boundless.

Here he found the butter exactly right—though the weather was hot, the butter kept its shape as well as beeswax. He catechized the old lady about her housewifery—for the bread was as right as the butter. The old lady said her health was feeble—she could do but little, and Jenny had the whole arrangement. He made some round inquiries concerning Jenny; and learned that she was a hearty, black-haired, black-eyed lass, of about two and twenty; and had never seen a piano nor attended a ball—but knew the Assembly's Catechism; could sing Old Hundred to a charm—spin flax and darn stockings, and was then gone to town with butter. He lingered, but she was delayed, and when his excuses for staying was exhausted he started. He could not get the good butter out of his mind, and how it happened I know not, he soon found his way there again, and the result of his adventure was, he made a wife ot Jane McKean. And now one lump of his butter is worth all that Joe would make in a month. There's no trouble in going to market—the keepers of genteel boarding houses in the neighboring villages send and take it at the highest market price.

Now the main difference in these two women arises from the training, though there is no difference in natural disposition. Old Madam Sly never looked on to see that Sally did up her work right, but suffered her to sly off her work as she chose, and though a good housekeeper herself, was altogether too indulgent, and like some mothers, thought more of getting Sally well married than of making her fit for a wife—whilst old madam McKean was determined Jenny should be fit for any man's wife, whether she got married or not. Perhaps there is no more certain criterion by which to judge of a woman's general character for neatness and good housekeeping than by the quality of her butter. Find on the farmer's table a good, solid, properly-salted, well-worked slice of butter, and you need not fear to eat the pancakes or hash; but if you see a splash of half-worked butter, salt in lumps, and a sprinkling of hair and flies' legs, you may be sure that if you board there very long, death will not be obliged to wait much for you to finish your peck of dirt.

My advice is, to young farmers, to make it a sine qua non in a wife that she makes prime butter; and the young ladies who aspire to be farmers' wives had much better be imperfect in fillagree and music, than in the most important art of making butter, which smoothes not only the sharp corners of crust and crackers, but will smooth asperities of the husband's temper.

INDUSTRY.

The United States possesses within her borders all the natural advantages of clime, soil, mineral, and commercial greatness, inland seas, endless rivers, mines of inexhaustible stores for fuel, a soil that can feed ourselves and starving millions abroad, and above all an energetic and industrious population. Our mountains might be gold and our vallies silver, and the earth might spontaneously yield as luxuriously as the rich savannahs beneath the belted zone of Africa, but if we had not a people intelligent and industrious we should be poor indeed. The great capacity of the United States lies in her people. Industry—downright honest industry, is the wealth of nations. It is indeed true that we are much indebted for our rapid advancement in the race of national greatness to our natural resources, but with an energetic, industrious, and intelligent population no country will be poor. New England is by no means a fertile land, but her people, that hive of industrious bees, make up in fertile industry and invention, what her soil lacks in productive quality. She has coined money out of the ice that forms on her ponds, and pressed gold out of her flinty rocks, and now with her wealth, she is the road builder of nearly the whole continent. Her capitalists own more stocks in railroads than all the rest of the States put together. And how did she get those stocks? By downright industry—her natural resources are in her people. All honor then to industry, and intelligence, and moral worth. We are often pained to hear people talking of the greatness of our country, and attributing this to its rocks, its mountains, and valleys. These were in existence before our fathers trod our shores, and the unbroken forest reared its dark shadows over the ground where hundreds of cities and towns now rear their glittering spires and lofty domes. What has made this change? Industry. Without industry the forest would still have frowned in gloomy grandeur where the cheerful smiles of civilized plenty now deck the valley and mountain. Without industry, the wild deer ——— would still

Come down and drink his fill
At fair Manhattan's silvery rill.

When our citizens speak of our national greatness, never let them forget that all this is the fruit of industry, and it is the anticipation of a just reward for labor that is now peopling the mighty valley of the West—it is in anticipation of a just reward for the toil that causes the emigrant to pierce the gorges of the distant Rocky Mountains and pitch his tent on the banks of the Willamette. All honor then, we say again to embrowned industry—an industrious, intelligent, enterprising, and moral people, is the real gold and silver of our Republic.

THE NATIONAL CLOCK.

When completed, the Westminster palace clock will be the most powerful one in the empire. According to the specification given in certain Parliamentary papers which have been published, it is to "strike the hours on a bell from eight to ten tons, and, if practicable, chime quarters upon eight bells, and show the time upon eight dials 30 feet in diameter." With the exception of a skeleton dial at Malines, the above dimensions, are remarked by a writer in Chambers' Journal, surpass those of any other clock face in Europe. The dial of St. Paul's is, as yet, the largest in this country with a minute hand; it is 18 feet in diameter. This new one is to be an eight-day clock, and as perfect as possible. Its formation is to be under the direction and approval of Mr. Airy, the Astronomer Royal. Among the conditions drawn up by him are these:—The frame to be of cast iron; wheels to be of hard bell metal, with steel spindles, working in bell metal bearings and to be separately shipped and unshipped. Accuracy of movement to be insured by dead-beat escapement, compensating pendulum, and going fusee. The first blow of the hammer, when striking the hour, to be within a second of true time. Galvanic communication will probably be established with Greenwich Observatory. The four sets of hands, with the motion wheels, it has been calculated, will weigh 12 cwt.; and the head of the hammer 200 lbs.; the weights 150 to 300 lbs.; and the pendalum bob, 3 cwt. One of the candidates proposes to jewel the escapement pallet with sapphires. The motion of the minute hand is not to be constant; it will move once every twenty seconds, when it will go over a space of nearly four inches.

THE MINDS OF ANIMALS INFERIOR TO MAN.

Of their apparent knowledge of the sciences, arts, and of their professions, occupations, and employments.

Bees are Geometricians. Their cells are constructed as, with the least quantity of material, to have the largest size spaces and least possible loss of interstice.

So also is the Ant-Lion; his funnel-shaped trap is exactly correct in its conformation, as if it had been formed by the most skillful artist of our species, with the aid of the best instrument.

The Mole is a Meteorologist.

The bird called the "Nine-kille" is an Arithmetician; so also is the Crow, the Wild-Turkey, and some other birds.

The Torpedo, the Ray, and the Electric Eel, are Electricians.

The Nautilus is a Navigator. He sets and lowers his sails, casts and weighs anchor, and performs the other nautical evolutions.

Whole tribes of birds are Musicians.

The Beaver is an Architect, Builder, and Woodcutter. He cuts down the timber and builds houses and dams.

The Marmot is a civil engineer. He not only builds houses, but constructs acqueducts to keep them dry.

The White Ants maintain a regular army of soldiers.

The East India Ants are horticulturists. They raise mushrooms, upon which they feed their young.

Wasps are paper manufacturers.

Catepillars are silk-spinners.

The Bird Ploceus Texter is a weaver; he weaves a web to make his nest.

The Prime is a tailor. He sews the leaves together to make his nest.

The Squirrel is a ferryman. With a chip or piece of bark for a boat and his tail for a sail, he crosses a stream.

Dogs, Wolfs, Jackalls, and many others are hunters.

The Black Bear and the Heron are fishermen.

The Ants have regular days of labor.

The Monkey is a rope-dancer.

OF GOVERNMENT.—The associations of Beavers present us with a model of Republicanism.

The Bees live under a Monarchy.

The Indian Antelopes furnish an example of Patriarchical government.

Elephants exhibit an aristocracy of elders.

Wild Horses are said to elect their leader.

And Sheep in a wild state, are under the control of a military chief ram.

TREASON.

The article for which Mr. Mitchell, the editor of the United Irishman, has been arrested and committed to Newgate, commences as follows:

"I tell you frankly, that I, for one, am not 'loyal.' I am not wedded to the Queen of England, nor unalterably attached to the House of Brunswick. In fact, I love my own barn better than I love that house. The time has long past when Jehovah annointed kings. The thing has long since grown a monstrous imposture, and has been already, in some few civilized countries, detected and drummed out accordingly. As for the 'institutions of the country,' I loathe and despise them; we are sickening and dying of these institutions fast; they are consuming us like a plague, degrading us to paupers in mind, body, estate, yes, making our very souls beggarly and cowardly. They are a failure and a fraud, these institutions—from the topmost crown jewel to the meanest detective's note-book there is no soundness in them. Their last hour is at hand; I thank God that I live in the days when I shall witness the utter downfall, and trample upon the grave of the portentous, the grandest, meanest, falsest, and cruelest tyranny that ever deformed the world."

THE SERVANT'S DOCTORATE.

When the University of St. Andrew's, Scotland, sold her honors, a certain minister, who deemed that his ministration would be more acceptable if he possessed what the Germans call the doctor-hat, put £15 in his purse and went to St. Andrew's to "purchase for himself a good degree." His man-servant accompanied him, and was present when his master was formally admitted to the long-desired honor. On his return "the doctor" sent for his servant, and addressed him as follows: "Noo, Saunders, ye'll aye be sure to ca' me the doctor; and gin ony spiers to ye about me, ye'll be aye sure to say 'the doctor's in his study', or 'the doctor's engaged,' or 'the doctor will see you in a crack.'" "That a' depends," was the reply, "whether ye ca' me the doctor, too!" (The Rev. Dr, started.) "Ay, it's just so," continued the other; "for when I found that it cost so little, I e'en got a diploma myself, sa ye'll be just good enough to say, 'doctor, put on some coals,' or, 'doctor, bring the whisky and hot water,' and and gin ony body spiers at ye about me, ye'll be aye sure to say, 'the doctor's in the stable,' or, 'the doctor's in the pantry,' or, 'the doctor's digging potatoes.' as the case may be." [Arvine.

TWO PARAGRAPHS IN A LETTER.—We clip the following from the correspondence of the Journal of Commerce, as one of the most remarkable specimens of the "from the grave to gay," from poetry to prose, we have seen for some time:—

"Sorrowful intelligence is the burden of a letter lying on my table, which I have found in Albany to-day on my arrival. An event I loved to look into, I shall never fathom with affection again. A voice that has whispered many a word in my ear is hushed to voiceless slumber, and the red lips have passed from my caressing. Arms that have folded me in their pure embrace are meekly folded across the upheaving breast, and dust hath gone to dust. I am growing old faster than by the simple passage of years.

"I shall bring this letter to you in person, and then pass on Eastward. I'm told that cod and haddock are plentiful off Stonington, and if so, you may happen to hear from me there. But it is doubtful when and whence I write again."

VARIETY.

Every body knows that industry is a fundamental virtue in the man of business. But it is not every sort of industry that tends to wealth. Many men work hard to do a great deal of business, and, after all, make less money than they would if they did less. Industry should be expended in seeing to all the details of business; in carefully finishing up each separate undertaking, and in the maintenance of such a system as will keep everything under control.

A lady applied to the eminent philanthropist of Bristol, Richard Reynolds, on behalf of a little orphan boy. After he had given liberally, she said, "When he is old enough, I will teach him to name and thank his benefactor." "Stop," said the good man, "Thou art mistaken. We do not thank the clouds for rain. Teach him to look higher, and thank Him who giveth both the clouds and the rain."

Mr. Dodd, an eminent minister, being solicited to play at cards, rose from his seat and uncovered his head. Being asked what he was going to do, he replied, "To crave God's blessing." The company exclaimed, "We never asked a blessing on such an occasion." "Then," said he, "I never engage in anything, but on what I can beg of God to give his blessing."

Ovid finely compares a broken fortune to a fallen column; the lower it sinks, the greater weight it is obliged to sustain. Thus, when a man's circumstances are such that he has no occasion to borrow, he finds neighbors willing to lend him; but should his wants be such that he is sued for a trifle, he finds it difficult to obtain trust for the smallest sum.

The Boston Whig says, among the Aldermen elect in Providence, we notice the name of Mr. James S. Ham, printer, who still "works at the case," if his fattening for the Aldermanship does not prevent him. Mr. Ham received the largest vote given in the Municipal Election, and we trust yet to see him Mayor, which office even he could not fail to honor.

A begger asked Dr. Smollett for alms, he gave him through mistake a guinea. The poor fellow perceiving it, hobbled after him to return it; upon which Smollett returned it to him, with another guinea as a reward for his honesty, exclaiming at the same time, "What a lodging has honesty taken up with!"

A respectable merchant of London, having been embarrassed in his circumstances, and his misfortunes having been one day the subject of conversation in the Royal Exchange, several persons expressed great sorrow; when a foreigner who was present said, "I feel five hundred pounds for him, what do you feel?"

Childhood is like a mirror, catching and reflecting images from around it. Remember that an impious or profane thought, uttered by a parent's lip may operate upon the young heart like a careless spray of water thrown upon polished steel, staining it with rust, which no after scouring can efface.

Nothing is more easy than to magnify a trifling circumstance into a serious misfortune, by suffering the mind to dwell upon, and place it in every possible point of view, each assuming a darker shade than the former. It is the common fault of a vivid imagination to exaggerate either good or evil.

The most precious of all possessions, is power over ourselves; power to witness trial, to bear sufferings, to front danger; power over pleasure and pain; power to follow our convictions, however resisted by menace and scorn; and power of calm reliance in scenes of darknes and storms.

Coleridge, in speaking of matrimony, uses the following very explicit sentence: "I mean that willing sense of the insufficingness of the self for itself which predisposes a generous nature to see, in the total being of another, the supplement and completion of its own."

True politeness consists of an exquisite observance of the feelings of others, and an invariable respect for those feelings. By this definition it claims alliance with benevolence, and may as often be found genuine in the cottage as in the court.

Louis the IXth, king of France, was found instructing a poor kitchen boy; and being asked why he did so, replied, "The meanest person hath a soul as precious as my own, and bought with the same blood of Christ."

The wisest man may occasionally do a weak thing; the most honest man a wrong thing; the proudest man a mean thing; and the worst of men will sometimes do a good thing.

An ancient writer very forcibly defines the difference between war and peace. "In the time of peace the sons bury their fathers; in the time of war the fathers bury their sons."

It was a usual saying of Pascal, that the sciences produced no consolation in the times of affliction; but the knowledge of Christianity was a comfort both in adversity, and defect of all other knowledge.

A few weeks since, a gentleman in Enford, England, shot a pigeon, to the neck of which was attached a label of red morocco leather, bearing the words, "Boston Jan. 6, 1848."

It was a saying of a great divine, that he had found more good in bad people, and more bad in good people, than he ever expected.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties ot their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, }
IRA SAYLES, } Principals,

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

| | |
|---|---|
| Board, per week, | $1 00 |
| Room-rent, per term, | 1 50 |
| Tuition, per term, | $3 50 to 5 00 |
| Incidental expenses, per term, | 25 |

EXTRAS PER TERM.

| | |
|---|---|
| Piano Forte, | $10 00 |
| Oil Painting, | 7 00 |
| Drawing, | 2 00 |

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

President of the Board of Trus

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

The Sabbath Recorder.

DR. BOUNDE'S SABBATH.

The first book of any note published in England upon the Sabbath question after the Reformation, was by Dr. Nicholas Bounde, who appears to have treated the subject in a novel manner, in the estimation of the learned ecclesiastics of the Church of England, as well as of most of his cotemporaries on the continent. Having, about the year 1586, preached a course of sermons on the ten commandments, wherein he took occasion to treat the fourth commandment according to the views of the Sabbatarians, urging the validity of that commandment, as to the day and duties thereof for his premises, and concluding his argument so as to justify the observance of the first day of the week instead of the seventh. Many of his hearers were so pleased, that he was very strenuously urged to publish the same, which he, from considerations of policy, at first declined to do; yet in the year 1595 he published a book on the fourth commandment, and gives the following as a reason:—

"It contained that argument which, as it is of all others most excellent, so it was leaste of all dealt in, by anie largely and of purpose." And, apologizing to the reader, he says—"As I have not rashly, and on the sodaine fallen into these opinions, and thrust foorth myselfe into the world, so I most humbly crave of you this favoure, that all prejudice and sinister affection being layde aside, all things might be weighed in an even ballance before they be refused as not having their just weight, even there where they might carry some shew of untruth according to the canonical rule of the Apoostle." . . . "I am not ignorant that this argument of the Sabbath is full of controversie above many other points of divinitie, wherin many learned and godly men dissent one from another, which as I was perswaded of at the first, so now of late, since I attempted the publishing of this book I have founde it to bee true, by a most unwilling experience; even among those who for their great variety of learning, deserve singularly to bee admired."

Dr. Bounde had studied the Scriptures enough to draw out the true nature of the Sabbath according to the doctrines of the fourth commandment, which required the observance of the specific day, the SEVENTH DAY, and he does not appear to have discovered the shift made afterward, that a seventh part of time only was required. He says, on page 35:—

"In six dayes the Lord made the heavens, and the earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day, therefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it; which in the verse going before hee calleth the seventh day. Thus we learne that God did not only bless it, but blessed it for this cause, and so we see that the Sabbath must be still upon the seventh day as it alwaies hath beene. But now concerning this very special seventh day that now we keepe in the time of the gospel that is well knowne, that it is not the same it was from the beginning, which God himselfe did sanctifie and whereof hee speaketh in this commandment; for it was the day before ours, which in Latin retaineth its ancient name, and is called the Sabbath, which we also grant, but so that we confesse it must alwaies remaine never to be changed any more."

Inconsistent, however, as this reasoning appears, there were not a few who entertained and advocated his views, especially among the puritans, whose strict and legal habits were well suited to sabbatarian doctrines, provided no inconvenient change should be required of them as to the particular day of the week to be observed. The Church of Scotland had been established about two years, by an act of Parliament, when Dr. Bounde published his book, a shelter was thus early provided for the defense of the new doctrine against the power of the Church of England, which was decidedly against his views; nevertheless he was converted and his book condemned, whereupon Archbishop Whitguift, in 1599, ordered the destruction of the edition, and the Lord Chief Justice, Sir John Popham, prohibited the printing of any other, because it was considered as "teaching new dogmas unauthorized by our religion!" He, having opposed religious freedom in his book, justified the principles of his persecutors which must have consoled him, for thus he argues, on page 274:—

"Now that all households might be thus prepared unto, and furthered in the true sanctifying of the Sabbath, it behoveth all kings, princes, and rulers, that professe the true religion, to inact such laws, and to see them diligently executed, whereby the honour of God in hallowing these dayes might be maintained. If all their people and subjects throughout the whole land, or any of them, doe faile in it through any default of theirs, the Lord will require it of them, so much the more severely, by how much they have more power to bring every thing to passe within their dominions than a private man hath in his household, and the offence that is publike, is greater than that which is private. And, indeed, this is the chief end of all government that men might not professe what religion they list, and serve God after what manner it pleaseth them best; but that the parts of God's true worship might be set up everywhere, and all men compelled to stoope unto it and make profession of it; at least-wise in the outward discipline of the church, that so thereby we might live more peacably ourselves and doe more dueties unto men. And this is that good report which Eusebius giveth of Constantine, the Emperour, that he made laws compelling all men to the publike service of God upon the Lord's-day, exempting no man therefrom—no, not the souldier in warre—who prescribed to them for that purpose formes of prayer, and commanded them to be occupied in other parts of God's worship."

The true Sabbath-keepers of that time had this delusion of churchmen, papists, and puritans, to contend with, and were more exposed to its power than any others, for, by meeting upon the seventh day, they became a mark much more conspicuous than those who observe the first day, though the latter were not of the established faith in regarding the character of Sunday as a religious festival. In 1606, Dr. Bounde published another book with additions, and the controversy ran high; so that Dr. Heylin says:—

"It carried a faire face and shew of pietie at the least, in the opinion of the common people, and such who stood not to examine the true grounds thereof, but tooke it up on the appearance; such, who did judge thereof, not by the workmanship of the stuffe, but the glosse and colour. In which it is most strange to see how suddainly men were induced not onely to give way unto it, but without more adoe, to abett the same; till in the end, and that in a very little time, it grew the most bewitching errour, the most popular deceit that ever had been set on foot in the Church of England." S.

FAMILY PRAYER.

If there be any head of a family before whom this paper shall come, who neglects the daily remembrance of God at the head of his household—and that there are such negligent Christians, we are too well assured—we hope that a word spoken in kindness may have the effect to warn him against his omission, and that he will forthwith determine that it shall not be a subject of complaint, and an occasion of stumbling for the future. The common plea is want of time. But we have yet to meet the household in which time is not found to assemble daily to partake of bodily food and sustenance. There are stated hours for refreshment of the outward man, which are observed with punctuality, and provided for with a diligence and an exactness to which all other daily avocations are made subordinate.

But, it is said, we pray in our closets, and at odd moments, as we have opportunity. Do you eat thus? Do you catch a mouthful of food when you have nothing else to do—and on some days forego it altogether; and forget it? And is the body then more than the soul? Rest assured that as the body cannot remain in health and in vigor without careful attention to its wants, neither can the spiritual life be sustained in health and vigor without stated and regular worship. We are as positively commanded to unite and to sympathize with and support each other in prayer and thanksgiving, as we are to pray in secret. And true spiritual worship in the closet will dispose us for assembling around the family altar; while family worship will make the closet's exercises, and the silent and retired meditation on God's word, more dear and more precious.

There is no firmer bond of Christian love than that which is found in a household, the members of which neglect not the assembling of themselves together. Unkindness, and the little crosses and vexations of daily intercourse are forgotten or removed by the union of hearts and of voices in addressing "Our Father." A tie of brotherhood is thus recognized superior to all others—cementing union, ennobling love, purifying the heart, and strengthening the affections. At these assemblies of "two or three," the Redeemer is present, and his blessing follows the members of a praying household. Parents rule in love, and children obey in affection. The husband is sanctified by the wife, and the wife by the husband. The reverses of this world are better supported in a house, the inhabitants of which look for a better country—that is an heavenly; and prosperity is not so dangerous to the family who daily acknowledge that every good gift comes from God. The patriarchal, which was the first government, is the germ of all others. Family worship, which was the first, is the soul of piety in the church, and the support of godliness in the world.

CLERICAL ADVICE.—A young clergyman once visited old Dr. Bellamy, with the inquiry, "What shall I do to supply myself with matter for my sermons?" The Dr. quaintly replied, "Fill up the cask—FILL UP THE CASK; and then if you tap it anywhere, you will obtain a good stream. But if you put in but little, it will dribble, dribble, dribble, and you must tap, tap, tap, and then you will have but a small stream after all. Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly, in all wisdom, and out of the abundance of the heart, thus stored with scripture truth, the hand will write and the lips speak."

INFIDELS GOING MASKED.—At an infidel convention, held in New York, John A. Collins, one of their principal speakers, discoursed at length upon the best means of supporting infidelity. After a series of railings against God and the Bible, and every thing sacred, he used this language: "I never deliver lectures on infidelity; but I am constantly lecturing on the various reforms of the age. I lecture on temperance, on anti-slavery, on peace, on moral reform, on socialism, &c., &c., but wherever I go I lecture on infidel principles! Thus our cause is promoted continually."

WHAT IS HAPPINESS?

Mother, what is that golden beam
  For which I near thee pray?
Thou hast said the flash of its gorgeous beam
  On earth will never stay.
Is it like the light from the dark blue sky,
  When the thunder echoes near?
Is it like the stars that sparkle on high?
  Shall we ever see it here?

My gentle boy, O think not here
  To know that mighty ray:
It burns in a holier, purer sphere,
  And can never pass away.
Not earthly love in its sunny hour,
  Though hope shed its lustre nigh,
Can teach thee the depth of that sacred power,
  For which thou hast heard me sigh.

But, O, in the glorious realms above,
  Where sorrow is never known,
Where nought but the seraphim songs of love
  Float o'er Jehovah's throne,
Where the hopes of the Christian's faith repose,
  Where the righteous of earth unite,
Where the spirit is healed of its bleeding woes,
  There is that golden light. [Ch. of Eng. Mag.

"NONE LIVETH TO HIMSELF."

"God has written upon the flower that sweetens the air, upon the breeze that rocks it upon its stem, upon the rain-drop that refreshes the smallest sprig of moss that rears its head in the desert, upon the ocean that rocks every swimmer in its chambers, upon every pencilled shell that sleeps in the caverns of the deep, as well as upon the mighty sun which warms and cheers the millions of creatures that live in his light—upon all He has written, 'None of us liveth to himself.'" Notwithstanding all that has thus been done to impress this important lesson upon our hearts, it is still one which the most of us are slow to learn, especially so as to exemplify it in our lives. We seem too generally to feel and act as though we were wholly independent of every thing around us, and under obligation to live for no one but ourselves. Many evils result from this state of things, both to ourselves and others. The path of true happiness is the path which God himself has marked out for us. "None of us liveth to himself." Such is the intimate relation which we sustain to our fellow men, as beings formed for society, and to all the creatures of God, that none of us can live to ourselves. Our influence will be felt in some way upon all with whom we have to do, and if it does not tell upon the promotion of their interests, it will result to their injury. Whatever may be the character of our influence, however, for it we shall be held responsible. It is our interest, therefore, as well as our duty, in all things, to live for others as well as for ourselves. We must seek the happiness of all with whom we have to do, and it is only when we are living under the influence of this principle, that we truly provide for our own interests. "None of us liveth to himself."

HAPPY EFFECTS OF HUMANITY.

The following facts of a young chief of the Pawnee nation, and son of Old Knife, one of the Indians who visited the city of Washington, in America, a few years ago, from the foot of the Rocky Mountains, are highly creditable to his courage, his generosity, and his benevolence. This young warrior, when these events occurred, was about twenty-five years old. At the age of twenty-one, his heroic deeds had acquired for him, among his people, the rank of "bravest of the brave." The savage practice of torturing and burning to death their prisoners existed in this nation. An unfortunate female, taken in war, of the Paduca nation, was destined to this horrible death. The fatal hour had arrived; the trembling victim, far from her home and her friends, was fastened to the stake; the whole tribe was assembled on the surrounding plain, to witness the awful scene. Just when the wood was about to be kindled, and the spectators were on the tiptoe of expectation, this young warrior, who sat composedly among the chiefs, having before prepared two fleet horses, with the necessary provisions, sprang from his seat, rushed through the crowd, loosed the victim, seized her in his arms, placed her on one of the horses, mounted the other himself, and made the utmost speed towards the nation and friends of the captive. The multitude, dumb and nerveless with amazement at the daring deed, made no effort to rescue their victim from her deliverer. They viewed it as the act of their deity, submitted to it without a murmur, and quietly retired to their village. The released captive was accompanied through the wilderness toward her home, till she was out of danger. He then gave her the horse on which she rode, with the necessary provisions for the remainder of her journey, and they parted. On his return to the village, such was the respect entertained for him, that no inquiry was made into his conduct; no censure was passed on it; and, since this transaction, no human sacrifice has been offered in this or any of the Pawnee tribes. Of what influence is one bold act in a good cause!

On the publication of this anecdote at Washington, the young ladies of a female seminary, in that city, presented this brave and humane Indian with a handsome silver medal, on which was engraven an appropriate inscription; accompanied by an address, of which the following is the close:—"Brother, accept this token of our esteem; always wear it for our sake; and, when you have again the power to save a poor woman from death and torture, think of this and of us, and fly to her rescue." [Arvine.

VALUE OF A DOLLAR.—If you would learn the value of a dollar, go and labor two days in the burning sun as a hod carrier. This is an excellent idea, and if many of our young gentlemen had to earn their dollars in that way, how much less dissipation and crime would we witness every day? So of our fashionable young ladies, if they, like some of the poor seamstresses of our large cities, had to earn their dollars by making shirts at ten cents apiece, how much less finery would we see about them, and how much more truthful notions would they have of their duties of life and their obligations to the rest of the world!

SAURIN'S MANNER OF PREACHING.

Saurin is described as having a strong, clear, harmonious voice. He practiced two oratorical artifiees, using the term in the best sense—namely, that of beginning his discourses in a low and subdued tone, and that of pausing at the end of the sentence to observe the effect upon his hearers. He wept from pure feeling, in addressing the wicked. This we could easily imagine from examining the appeals in his published discourses; but they would not at all suggest the description given by one who heard him. "His preaching resembled a plentiful shower of dew, softly and imperceptibly insinuating itself into the minds of his numerous hearers, as dew into the pores of plants till the whole church was dissolved, and all in tears under his sermons." In almost all his productions he displays great metaphysical subtlety, which one would scarcely suppose to flow in so soft a method. Here, too, in fact, is discernible his greatest fault, for he appears to raise difficulties in order to solve them. In the general course of his argumentation, there is an air of vivacity and glowing energy, and in his appeals, ardor, pungency, and force. His mode of winding up a discourse by reiteration and amplifications of a portion of the text, or some one prominent idea, is powerfully impressive. [Evan. Preacher.

THE BIBLE.

The Bible is the treasure of the poor, the solace of the sick, and the support of the dying; and while other books may amuse and instruct in a leisure hour, it is the peculiar triumph of that book to create light in the midst of darkness, to alleviate the sorrow which admits of no other alleviation, to direct a beam of hope to the heart, which no other topic of consolation can reach; while guilt, despair, and death, vanish at the touch of its holy inspiration. There is something in the spirit and diction of the Bible which is found peculiarly adapted to arrest the attention of the plainest and most uncultivated minds. The simple structure of its sentences, combined with a lofty spirit of poetry—its familiar allusions in the scenes of nature, and the transactions of common life—the delightful intermixture of narration with the doctrinal and perceptive parts—and the profusion of miraculous facts, which convert it into a sort of enchanted ground—its constant advertence to the Deity, whose perfections it renders almost visible and palpable—unite in bestowing upon it an interest which attaches to no other performance, and which, after assiduous and repeated perusal, invests it with much of the charm of novelty; like the great orb of day, at which we are wont to gaze with unabated astonishment from infancy to old age. What other book besides the Bible could be heard in public assemblies from year to year, with an attention that never tires, and an interest that never cloys? With a few exceptions, let a portion of the sacred volume be recited in a mixed multitude, and though it has been heard a thousand times, a universal stillness ensues, every eye is fixed, and every ear is awake and attentive. Select, if you can, any other composition, and let it be rendered equally familiar to the mind, and see whether it will produce this effect. [R. Hall.

"HOW D'YE DO."

A little girl exhibited a faith in her father, a short time ago, which is worthy of record for its faithful likeness to the true disciple's faith in his divine Master. Her father had often told her that when dogs ran out to bark at the traveler on the road, that they were only saying, "how d'ye do?" The child having never learned to doubt her father's word, believed what he said, and remembered it. On one occasion they were passing a house from which there came out a ferocious dog, rushing towards them as if he would tear them to pieces. As they were on foot, the father could not help a feeling of terror, and a disposition to attempt an escape from the rude salutation of the dog, who seemed less polite to him than to the confiding child. She looked without fear to the assailant, and with a sweet smile, as she had been taught, "How d'ye do, doggy?"

Here is a beautiful illustration of faith in God. He tells us to trust in him, and fear nothing. One who has the spirit of a little child, believes the word of God, and never fears as long as he is in the path of duty. The wind may howl, the the waters may dash, the thunders may roar, the lightnings may flash, but he is calm—the heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord; he shall never be moved. Enemies cannot terrify him; pestilence flying in darkness, and destruction at noon-day are alike unable to shake his childish trust in the promise of God to defend him. Another, yielding to an evil heart of unbelief, trembles at every gale, goes shivering with fear where he might be tranquil through the power of faith. He does not receive the promise of God as a little child, but mingles the promptings of a doubting heart with every pledge of the divine veracity.

A FABLE FOR THE FRETFUL.—"It is I that support this household," said a hen one day to herself; "the master cannot breakfast without an egg, for he is dyspeptical and would die, and it is I that lay it—and here is the ugly poodle, doing nothing earthly, and gets thrice the victuals I do, and is caressed all day! By the cock of Minerva, they shall give me a double portion of oats, or they have eaten their last egg!" But much as she cackled and croaked, the scullion would not give her any extra grain; where upon in dudgeon, she hid her next egg in the dung-hill, and did nothing but cackle and croak all day. The scullion suffered her for a week, then (by order) drew her neck, and purchased eggs at sixpence the dozen. Man! why frettest thou and whinest thou? This blockhead is happier than thou, and still a blockhead! Ah, sure enough thy wages are too low! Wilt thou strike work with Providence, and force him to an alternative? Believe it, he will do without thee; "il n'y a point d' homme nécésaire." [Carlyle.

FOR YOUNG HOUSEKEEPERS.

In early childhood you lay the foundation of poverty or riches, in the habits you give your children. Teach them to save everything—not for their own use, for that would make them selfish, but for some use. Teach them to share everything with their play-mates; but never allow them to destroy anything. Economy is generally dispised as a low virtue, tending to make people ungenerous and selfish. This is true of avarice; but it is not so of economy. The man who is economical, is laying up for himself the permanent power of being useful and generous. He who thoughtlessly gives away ten dollars, when he owes a hundred dollars more than he can pay, deserves no praise,—he obeys a sudden impulse, more like instinct than reason; it would be real charity to check this feeling; because the good he does may be doubtful, while the injury he does his family and creditors is certain. True economy is a careful Treasurer in the service of benevolence; and where they are united, respectability, prosperity, and peace will follow. If men would have women economical, they must be so themselves! What motive is there for patient industry, and careful economy, when the savings of a month are spent in some useless and selfish gratification, and more than the value of a much desired but rejected dress is expended during the stay of a new set of comedians? Make your own bread and cake. Some people think it just as cheap to buy of the baker and confectioner; but it is not half as cheap. True, it is more convenient, and therefore the rich are justifiable in employing them; but those who are under the necessity of being economical, should make convenience a secondary object. In the first place, confectioners make their cake richer than people of moderate income can afford to make it; in the next place, your domestic, or yourself, may just as well employ your own time, as to pay them for theirs.

THE CHILD AND THE FIRE-FLIES.

The dimness of twilight fell upon a white cottage and its enclosure of trees and flowering shrubs. As the darkness increased, fire-flies came and swarmed in the air,—a shower of living jewels.

"O, how pretty!" cried a little blue-eyed girl, rushing from the cottage and spreading out her small apron to capture the glittering insects. Two or three were imprisoned; and seating herself upon the soft grass beneath the high boughs, she carefully inspected her booty. Suddenly, her sunny face became clouded with disappointment; and throwing the dull-brown creatures from her with disgust, she exclaimed, "They are not pretty any more!"

"Ah! my little one!" said her mother, "this is but a symbol of the more bitter disappointments that await you in life. Pleasures will flutter temptingly around your path; but you will grasp them but to fling them from you, and cry, 'They are beautiful no more!' But, see, dearest, your released fire-flies, beautiful only upon the wing, sparkling now as gladly as ever. Such are the enjoyments of earth. Learn neither to despise them, nor to look to them for satisfying happiness. Fleeting and illusive as they are they often illumine the darkness of our mortal pilgrimage, and point our immortal yearnings to Paradise for the perfection of bliss."

HOLINESS.

Holiness is a very comprehensive word, and expresses a state of mind and conduct that includes many things. It is the work of the Spirit in our sanctification; the fruit of faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; and the operation of the new nature, which we receive in regeneration. Holiness may be viewed in various aspects, according to the different objects to which it relates.

Toward God, it is supreme love; delight in his moral character; submission to his will; obedience to his commands; zeal for his cause; observance of his institutes; and seeking his glory. Toward Christ, it is a conformity to his example, and imbibing his spirit. Toward man, it is charity, integrity, truth mercy. Toward sin, it is a hatred of all iniquity, a tender conscience, easily wounded by little sins, and scrupulously avoiding them; together with a laborious, painful, self-denying, progressive mortification of all the known corruptions of our heart, and a diligent seeking for such as are unknown. Toward self, it is the control of our fleshly appetites; the eradication of our pride; the mortification of our selfishness. Toward divine things in general, it is spirituality of mind, or habitual current of pious thought, and devout affections flowing through the soul. And toward the objects of the unseen world, it is heavenly mindedness a turning away from things seen and temporal, to things unseen and eternal.

[J. A. James.

WHO IS OLD?—A wise man will never rust out. As long as he can move and breathe, he will do something for himself, his neighbor, or for posterity. Almost to the last hour of his life, Washington was at work. So were Franklin, and Young, and Howard, and Newton. The vigor of their lives never decayed. No rust marred their spirits. It is a foolish idea to suppose that we must lie down and die because we are old. Who is old? Not the man of energy; not the day-laborer in science, art, or benevolence; but he only who suffers his energies to waste away and the springs of life to become motionless; on whose hands the hours drag heavily, and to whom all things wear the garb of gloom. Is he old? should not be put; but is he active? can he breathe freely and move with agility? There are scores of gray-headed men we should prefer, in any important enterprise, to those young gentlemen who fear and tremble at approaching shadows, and turn pale at a lion in their path, at a harsh word or a frown.

MORE EDITORIAL CHIT-CHAT.

Alfred, N. Y., June 19, 1848.

An opportunity to take a ride of one hundred and fifty miles through the heart of the Empire State, does not occur every day, and should not be neglected when it does occur. So we thought while at DeRuyter consulting about the best mode of getting to Allegany County. Accordingly we procured a team for the purpose, and took the reins into our own hands;—no very great novelty, to be sure, to those who are used to it, but something of a novelty to us, who have so long been accustomed to ride after the "iron horse," and in the character of mere passengers. We took the route through Homer, Scott, Skaneateles, Auburn, Seneca Falls, Waterloo, and Geneva, which gave us a view of some of the prettiest villages and most fruitful farms of the State. Homer has long been notorious for its delightful location, the taste with which its streets and park are laid out, and the air of neatness which prevails every where. Skaneateles is also a beautiful village, lying on the shore of a lake which bears the same name, and surrounded by a rich farming country, which supplies it with considerable mercantile and mechanical business.

Auburn has recently discarded the name of a village, and taken rank among cities. Its importance in the eyes of people generally, arises from the fact that it is the site of an extensive State Prison. From the Annual Report of the Inspectors of the Prison, presented to the Legislature in February last, it seems that the number of prisoners average about five hundred, of whom nearly one-half have families, a little more than one-half were intemperate, and about one-fourth could neither read nor write when received into the prison. The Legislature has recently authorized an appropriation from the funds of the prison for the purpose of instructing the convicts in the rudiments of learning. Judging from the improvement made by this class of men in the use of their hitherto circumscribed means, it is anticipated that very favorable results will follow the use of the increased facilities. Intemperance, the other fruitful source of crime, wretchedness, and misery, still calls loudly upon legislators to interpose some barrier to its onward and desolating course. Religious services have been regularly maintained in the prison, and the Chaplain expresses much confidence that they have produced good and permanent effects. About two hundred of the prisoners are instructed in the Sunday School. Through the use of such means, accompanied by the influences of the Holy Spirit, it is believed that some have been brought to repentance towards God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. The question of prohibiting by law all corporeal punishment of prisoners, has been extensively discussed for a few years past. The experiment is now being tried in this prison, but it has not yet gone far enough to justify a very confident expression of opinion, although we hope and believe that it will work well. In looking over the list of convicts discharged in 1847, we find that 154 had served out their time, 38 were pardoned, and 26 died. The number pardoned indicates a pretty liberal use of the pardoning power, and perhaps justifies to some extent the fears which have been expressed upon that point. With the financial condition of the prison no fault can be found. The earnings of the convicts during the last year amounted to $49,817, while the expenses for ordinary general support were $48,196, showing the aggregate of earnings to exceed the ordinary expenses by $1,621.

Geneva, the next town of importance on our route, is a real gem, appropriately set. It stands on the shore of the Seneca Lake, and is surrounded by a rich country, as fertile and highly cultivated as could reasonably be asked. For beauty of situation, and neatness and regularity of building, we do not know its equal. We approached it with admiration and delight; we left it with a degree of reluctance which we seldom feel under similar circumstances.

Alfred Center, the place from which this letter is dated, is familiar to many of our readers. Even those who have never visited it, have probably heard it described until it seems familiar to them. Perhaps, however, a visit might serve to change their impression as much as it has changed ours; for we frankly confess that ours has changed, and that for the better, with respect to the face of the country, the character of the village, and the extent of the institution. The Alfred Academy seems to have originated in a select school, opened in the fall of 1836, and taught in a private room by B. C. Church. In the spring of 1837, a one-story school house, 28 by 34 feet, was erected for the accommodation of a select school; and in the fall of that year James R. Irish was engaged to take charge of the school for four months. In the fall of the following year he took charge of the school again for six months, at the expiration of which time he was called to the pastoral care of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred, and was succeeded by Wm. C. Kenyon. In the summer of 1841 the academic building was enlarged by the erection of a two-story part, size 32 by 42 feet; and in the fall of the next year, 1842, the Institution was incorporated and placed under the patronage of the State. In the fall of 1845, Ira Sayles, a former student at Alfred, and a graduate of Union College, became associated with Mr. Kenyon as Principal of the Institution. Preparations were made the same fall for the erection of additional buildings, which had become necessary to accommodate the increased number of students. Three buildings were erected. Two of them were 38 by 52 feet, three stories high, one for the accommodation of ladies, and the other for the accommodation of gentlemen. The other was intended for the residence of the two Principals with their families and for a boarding house, and consisted of a main part, 38 by 48 feet, three stories high, with two wings, each 24 by 20 feet, two stories high. The cost of buildings, apparatus, &c., up to the present time, is about $17,000. The average number of teachers is seven, and the average number of students rising of two hundred.

I expect to leave this place to-morrow morning for the purpose of attending the meeting of the Western Association, at the conclusion of which I shall hurry back to my post as soon as possible.

CHRISTIAN SEVERITY.

It may be thought by many that severity should never be a component of the Christian character. But we differ from such an opinion. The efforts of many have been to find excuses for those, who, knowing the will of God, refuse to do it; and, by extracting from the love enjoined by Christ all its vigor and energy, have reduced it to a weak and sickly semblance of love, in the shape of a fawning indiscriminate fondness on all, scarcely knowing a difference between the virtuous and the vile, and exciting the just disapprobation of those who remember that the religion which it represents, though it surpasses all others in kindness, also surpasses all others in terror to the willfully ignorant and finally impenitent—though it has invitations and tears of entreaty even for foes, yet it has awful threatenings against the incorrigible, and anathemas against those who pervert its meaning. Among the multifarious exhibitions of this deformed principle, is that which prompts so many to forget the distinctions that in the New Testament mark the believer, and to admit as Christians nearly all who claim the title. Under the broad mantle of charity, so-called, a place is found for errorists of every hue. If we exclaim against such indiscriminate fellowship, we have urged against us the varying constitutions of minds, the great differences of opinion that may honestly exist, the criminality of harsh judging, and other considerations, all excellent in themselves, but here, we think, exceedingly faulty in their application. The question is, are we to receive as Christians, as regenerate persons, as washed by the blood of Christ and led by the Spirit of God, those men who reject the doctrines which constitute the gospel? There are but few to plead for those who pervert what all acknowledge as the great and essential principles of morality; yet those who disregard what they are pleased to call the minor or non-essential points of Christianity, have many apologists, from the supposed difficulty of understanding the written word.

Ethics, like all other sciences, has its elements, into which all its precepts are resolvable, and these, like those of others, are easily understood. As the Creator has placed those substances of the material world which are necessary to life and happiness, within the knowledge and the reach of all, though chemists only can explain their more intricate combinations, so none but metaphysicians are able to trace the intricacies, of moral science; but the principles on which it rests are the property of the race. No man, therefore, can plead, in excuse for transgression, that he was not a philosopher, for he sinned against a law which he knew by virtue of his humanity. Accordingly, when men flagrantly pervert these essential truths, they find few advocates. Their dishonesty is so glaringly evident, that little room is found for a plea in their behalf. Is this mode of judging appliable in no degree to the gospel? A scheme for the salvation of all, ought to be made level to the understanding of all. It is accordingly the boast of the gospel that it has made the way so plain that he that runs may read, and the traveler, though a fool in worldly wisdom, need not err therein. The fallen state of man, the atonement of Christ, the renovating power of the Spirit, are stated as pointedly and explicitly as language can make them; every page is luminous with concentrated light on these subjects. And so the commandments of God are no less explicitly and plainly pointed out; and the duty of obedience to them no less strictly enjoined than that of trusting to the renewing power of the Spirit and the redeeming qualities of the blood of Christ. At any rate, such would seem to be the opinion of the Apostle, for notwithstanding his exhortations as to the necessity of faith in order to the attainment of salvation, it is very evident that he does not mean that blind, inefficient kind of assent to the doctrines of the gospel which all men have, for we believe there are very few men, in a land of Bibles, but what are constrained to acknowledge the truth of the word of God; but the faith of which he speaks is that living faith which leads to the glorifying of God even to the denying of self—to the setting on high of his commandments, even to the abasement of the proud spirit of man. That such was his opinion, is easy enough seen from his writings, for he plainly says, that faith without works is dead, and is, therefore, of course, entirely useless, so far as the glorifying of God is concerned. It is little to the honoring of God to acknowledge that his word is true, that his commandments are holy, just, and good, and yet say that it is, after all, of but little consequence whether we obey them. But we need not refer the subject to man for decision, for we have higher authority, even that of Christ himself; for he says, Whosoever, therefore, shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven; but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. Are we not, then, justified in being somewhat severe in criticising the character of those who claim the title of Christian, while they claim the privilege of deviating from the word of God, in order to suit their own convenience? How shall we know them except by their fruits?

PROTESTANT ANNIVERSARIES IN FRANCE.

The Paris anniversaries, as we learn by a communication in the Journal of Commerce, commenced this year on the 7th of May, having been adjourned several days on account of the assembling of the National Convention, and the excitement which that event occasioned. The first meeting was held on the evening of the 7th of May, and the last on the 17th of the same month. The first was a meeting for prayer in reference to the anniversaries about to be held; the last was a meeting for thanksgiving for the goodness of God as manifested in the meetings which had just been held.

The Paris Tract Society held its 25th anniversary on the 8th of May. The Report was read by the Rev. Edmund de Presseuse, a young minister of much zeal and talent. It contained a great many details of the good effects of circulating religious tracts in France, and argued the importance of publishing without delay, a large number of tracts adapted to the peculiar circumstances in which France now is. The issues last year were 618,482 copies; but the commercial embarrassments of France have crippled the means of the Society and under its existing circumstances, it is unable to go forward with its work.

The Evangelical Society of France held its annual meeting on the 9th of May, at which the venerable Pastor Audebez presided. The Report was read by the Treasurer, M. de Presseuse. The Report was one of great interest, and contained many facts of vast importance. Never has the work of evangelizing France appeared so hopeful. In a great number of localities, almost the whole population call for the preaching of the gospel. The Report cited several cities, boroughs, and villages, from which the Catholic curates have been sent away by the people who have said: "No more Roman Catholic priests; we wish to become Protestants." The Committee of the Evangelical Society receive continually most pressing invitations to send to such and such places, ministers, teachers, and evangelists. But, alas, the pecuniary difficulties which hinder its progress, do not permit it to respond as it should do to these appeals. The Treasurer in terminating his Report, stated that the debt of the Society, which had lately surpassed 60,000 francs, had been reduced to 32,000. Whereupon an Englishman present, the Rev. Mr. Burgess, of London, who had been deeply interested in the details of the Report, came forward and laid on the table the sum of 6,500 francs—thus reducing the debt to about 25,000.

The Society for Evangelical Missions among the Unevangelized Nations held its annual meeting May 11. It was an interesting one, and gave many details of the progress of French missions in South Africa. The Society is laboring under embarrassments, and has been compelled to dismiss for the present five or six students who were preparing to labor among the heathen.

The French and Foreign Bible Society held its annual meeting May 12. M. de Gasparin, (an ex-peer of France, and the father of Count Agenor de Gasparin, who is so actively engaged in every thing which concerns Protestantism in the French realm and elsewhere,) presided. The Report states that that Society put into circulation last year 23,000 copies of the sacred Scriptures. If we add to this the number distributed by the Protestant Bible Society, and the British and Foreign Bible Society, which has an agency in Paris, the entire number of copies of the sacred Scriptures circulated in France last year must have exceeded 150,000. The French and Foreign Bible Society is supported almost entirely by the French Protestants themselves, as is the old Protestant Bible Society. The former diffuses the word of God among Roman Catholics as well as Protestants; the latter confines its labors to the Protestants alone, and is chiefly in the hands of that portion of the National Protestant Church which is not Evangelical in its principles.

Celibacy of the Romish Clergy.—The question of the compulsory celibacy of the Romish priesthood has been mooted in the Diet at Presburg by an ecclesiastical member. M. Kossuth replied that he was rejoiced to find the subject discussed in such quarters, and that he had received innumerable letters from the clergy, complaining of the prohibition. The question is engaging the attention of the Roman Catholic priesthood in other countries; and it is said that it has been brought under the notice of the Pope himself.

Important Committee.—At the late meeting of the Massachusetts Convention of Congregational Ministers, it was Resolved, That a Committee of nine be appointed to prepare a Report, to be presented to the next annual meeting of this Convention, containing a brief history of the rise and progress of slavery in our country, a view of the responsibility of the free States in regard to it, and a calm and temperate, but solemn and earnest appeal to the community on this momentous subject. The Committee appointed were—Dr. Lowell, of Boston; Dr. Hitchcock, of Randolph; Dr. Storrs, of Braintree; Dr. Worcester, of Salem; Mr. Thompson, of Salem; Mr. Hill, of Worcester; Mr. Briggs, of Plymouth; Mr. Childs, of Lowell; Mr. Lothrop, of Boston.

Portuguese Exiles.—By an Appeal from the American Protestant Society, (Heman Norton, Cor. Sec'y., M. De Motte, 150 Nassau st. Treasurer,) we learn that a community of Six Hundred human beings, exiles or emigrants from the Island of Madeira, where they were converted from the Catholic to the Protestant faith, and, as is alledged, were thereupon subjected to persecution and imprisonment, are now in the Island of Trinidad, endeavoring to support themselves by laboring for hire, but unable to do so through want of employment and by the general depression of business in that Island. They therefore desire to move to the United States, and, being wholly destitute, implore pecuniary assistance, especially from the zealous Protestants, to aid them in buying wild lands in the West and removing thither. We hope this appeal will be heard and heeded.

Presbyterian General Assembly.—This body has adjourned after a laborious session of fifteen days. During the session, the case of the Rev. Dr. Skinner was settled, after a most patient investigation. The decision of the Presbytery of Lexington, which had suspended him from the ministry, was reversed, and he restored to his full ministerial functions. The marriage question, whether a man may marry his wife's sister, came up and elicited some interesting debates. The Assembly left the rule as it was, and confirmed a decision of the Synod of North Carolina which had sanctioned the suspension of a man who had so married.

◆

Liberal Circulation of Books.—During the month of May the American Tract Society granted 1,663,000 pages of instructive reading for gratuitous distribution throughout the United States. In addition to various other foreign grants, the officers have recently remitted $800 to aid the Paris Tract Society. Since the opening of the financial year in April, 87 new colporteurs have been commissioned to labor in 17 different States, and 37 commissions have been renewed. The Society is now in the 24th year of its existence; at no former period was its yield of labor so extended or its prospects of increased usefulness so encouraging.

◆

An Example for American Christians.—A member of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland lately made a donation of $4,500 in aid of the foreign missions of that Church, stating as his reason that owing to the very depressed state of trade, and the consequent falling off in the ordinary sources of income, many individuals were unable to contribute so largely as formerly in behalf of missions, and it was, therefore, the duty of those who had been less affected by the late commercial distress, to give more liberally of their substance than, in other respects, might be deemed necessary.

◆

Methodist Church and Temperance.—One of the important measures adopted by the late General Conference of the Methodist Church at Pittsburgh, was the restoration of Mr Wesley's Rule on Temperance. Wesley's Rule prohibits "Drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity." The article says nothing about the manufacturer of spirituous liquors, but it was considered that "selling" them applied to the manufacturer. It is supposed that in some sections of that church the restoration of the Rule will be of no little practical value.

The Bible in Scotland.—The total number of Bibles published in Scotland in the ten years, commencing 1837, was 1,213,371; of Testaments, 2,150,973; of Psalm Books, 2,475,856; and of Confessions of Faith, 60,827. The greatest number of religious books was printed in 1845, viz:—Bibles, 284,050; Testaments, 292,450; Psalms, 254,500; Confessions of Faith, 10,000. The allowance in the shape of drawback of paper duty within the ten years amounted to 10,020*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*

Bequest to a College.—Miss Rachel B. Wallace, late of Burlington, Vt., has bequeathed to Burlington College the sum of $2,000, of which the interest is to be applied, under the direction of the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Diocese to aid such condidates for holy orders as he may select, in pursuing their theological studies at Burlington College.

College of the Sacred Heart.—Such is the name of a seminary about to be opened at Rochester, under the patronage of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Western New York. The Rev. James Delaune is to be President. It goes into operation in September.

Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine.—This really valuable reprint for June has been received. Its contents are rich and varied as usual, among which we find—"How to disarm the Chartists," "Stoddart and Angling," "The Caxtons," "Guesses at Truth," "Life in the 'Far West'," "Lombardy and the Italian War," "The Inca and his Bride," "Sentiments and Symbols of the French Republic," "American Feeling towards England." This is a work which we can recommend to our readers, and one which they will not delay to secure if they wish one of sterling worth. Its more solid articles are written in a spirit of dignity, candor, and truthfulness which few works can boast of; while the tone of its lighter articles are such as cannot be objected to by the most ardent friend of good morals. The present is a good time to subscribe, as a new volume commences with the July number. Terms $3 00 a year in advance. Published by Leonard Scott & Co., 79 Fulton-street, corner of Gold, N. Y.

Arrival of the President of Liberia in Boston.—His Excellency J. J. Roberts, the President of the new Republic of Liberia, with his wife and daughter, arrived at Boston on the morning of the 16th, in the bark Nehemiah Rich, Capt. Carlton, from Liberia April 21, via. St. Thomas and Turk's Island. He is accompanied by Revs. R. B. Wilson, J. J. Paine, and A. F. Russell, Mrs. J. N. Lewis, S. Harris and lady, and Mrs. M. Morse.

M., has been published, and fully sustains the character of its predecessors. The series is to be completed in eight numbers. Published by Leavitt, Trow & Co., 191 Broadway, at 25 cents per number.

The Cholera.—Several months ago the Asiatic cholera had reached Russia, in its westward march, and it was greatly feared that it would spread over Europe, as in 1832, and then cross to the United States. It is now thought that what remains of the disease will spend itself in Russia.

The First Temperance Reformer in Ireland.—The following remark was made by Rev. Mr. King of Dublin, in one of his addresses in New York:—

> The temperance reformation in Ireland was commenced by Mr. Martin, a Quaker, in Cork, and gradually enlisted a few Protestant clergymen, and laymen also, among the Protestants and the Roman Catholics. It has accomplished changes which no man—even an enthusiast—could have expected. The Roman Catholic priests at first opposed it; but some of them afterwards became its advocates, and among them Father Mathew.

The New Postage Bill.—The following are the principal provisions of the New Postage Bill, as reported to the House of Representatives:—

> The circulation of all newspapers free of postage, within thirty miles of the place of publication, not above the superfices of 1,900 square inches.
>
> Under one hundred miles and over thirty, one-half cent; over one hundred and for any farther distance, one cent.
>
> Newspapers above 1,900 inches to pay pamphlet and magazine postage, which is two cents for the first ounce, and half of one cent for all greater distances.
>
> Newspapers under 500 square inches to go free for the first 30 miles, and pay a quarter of one cent for all greater distances. Transient newspapers pay two cents when not sent from the office of publication.
>
> Publishers of pamphlets, magazines, and periodicals, are allowed a free exchange, the same as publishers of newspapers.

Religious use of Lots.—It is said to be one of the peculiar tenets of the Associated Reformed Church, formerly known as the Secession Church, and originally founded by the Erskines, that the use of lots to discover the indications of Providence is a scriptural and useful practice. This idea was once quite prevalent, but now, except in this communion, we suspect is universally abandoned. The Evangelist cites from a late periodical of that communion the following:—

> 1. The Christian may resort to it, [the lot] in connection with prayer and perhaps with fasting and humiliation, for the solution of painful doubts, as for the discovery of the path of duty in difficult cases.
> 2. Ministers of the gospsl may in the same way ascertain the divine will in regard to fields of labor, and courses of procedure upon which they are occasionally called to make a choice of their greater usefulness and comfort in the Master's service.
>
> 3. Brethren and neighbors may in like manner, and by a mutual agreement to abide by its decisions, use it in settling serious questions of difficulty, rather than encounter the vexations and expenses, and often times bitter animosities for life, of protracted and uncertain suits of civil law.
>
> 4. Nations may select Commissioners, who in a similar way, might satisfactorily and righteously settle boundaries, rights, and all matters of national interest, rather than resort to intrigue and all the horrid concomitants of ruinous and bloody wars. The lot is of the Lord to settle all matters of doubt and dispute, and who is so competent as He who is "wonderful in counsel and excellent in working?"

EUROPEAN NEWS.

By the arrival of the steamship Britannia on Sunday last, we have seven days' later European news.

France is still the theatre of considerable confusion. During the sitting of the National Assembly, on the 8th inst., it was reported that the police were in search of Prince de Joinville, who, it was said had arrived in Paris that morning. The resignation of Lamartine and Ledru Rollin is talked of, and suspicions are expressed that Lamartine was a party to the movement of the 15th of May. It is thought that M. Thiers will supplant Lamartine in authority. The Commission on the Constitution has decided that the political Constitution of France shall be a democratic republic; it is also declared that the people shall enjoy the rights of gratuitous education, employment, and assistance. Great alarm was excited by the approach of a monster banquet, to be held under the walls of the fortress of Vincennes. It was announced that there were already 100,000 subscribers.

In Ireland, the Repeal Association and Irish Confederation have fraternised, and a new society formed of the members of both under the style and title of the "Irish League." There is much doubt whether the material of which the League is composed can long work harmoniously together. Sympathy for Mrs. Mitchel and her children is still strong, and the funds collecting in their behalf are daily increasing. The sale of Mitchel's furniture took place on the 5th, and brought extremely high prices. The books with Mitchel's autograph brought, in many instances, one hundred times their original cost. The conviction of Mitchel has not quelled the strong spirit of disaffection which prevails in Ireland. On the 2d inst., a manifesto was issued, signed by Wm. S. O'Brien, couched in terms no less defiant of the law than the effusions of Mr. Mitchel.

In England, the London papers give an account of the arrest and examination of three Chartist leaders.

From Italy we have the important intelligence that Peschiera had surrendered and was in the hands of the troops of Charles Albert, and that an engagement had taken place at the same moment at Goito, between 30,000 Austrians, who last marched from Verona, and 15,000 Piedmontese, the result of which was, that the former were completely routed; and being pursued by the cavalry, when flying in confusion, a great portion were cut to piedes. It is said that Pope Pius had recovered all his popularity.

We have accounts from Austria to the 2d inst. The conduct of the Emperor is considered by the Viennese as most extraordinary. A deputation of ladies to present a petition requesting His Majesty to return to his capital, had been treated with marked rudeness at Innspruck. The Emperor took the petition from the ladies without saying a word, turned on his heel and walked away. The city was quiet, but distrust continued to prevail between the people and the noblesse.

We learn from Spain that the authorities of Cadiz have compelled all the British residents to furnish securities for their conduct. Arrests are daily taking place in Madrid.

The Cholera is again making sad havoc in Russia, according to the Berlineshe, Nachrichter, there were in one week 155 cases in Moscow, 57 of which terminated fatally.

Congressional.—Congress has, during the last week, so amended the naturalization laws, that a foreigner may become a citizen after being a resident of this country five years, even though he may have been out of the country during the time; whereas by the former law, if he should merely cross the line to some other country in the course of the five years, he would lose the benefit of his previous residence. There has also been considerable discussion as to whether the present session of Congress shall adjourn about the middle of July, but there seems a strong probability that this session will extend to the next; whereby they will save to the people their mileage for, of course, they will not expect to be paid for a constructive journey home, and back to Washington.

From Aux Cayes.—The schooner Abel Story, from Aux Cayes, May 30, arrived at Boston on the 11th. The Captain contradicts the story that the French Consul had been beaten there. Political matters were unchanged. Letters received are principally occupied with the details of the outrages enacted by the Government forces, partial accounts of which have been before received; they give full accounts of the proscription, mock trial, and murder of the venerable Dublasse, a merchant of Aux Cayes of nearly 80 summers; of the massacre of hundreds and hundreds of unresisting citizens at Aquin and other places; of the wanton destruction of property; and apprehensions of like scenes in places yet unheard from. A call is again made by American residents for the presence of men-of-war from the United States. An Englishman writes that the object of the blacks seems to be to possess themselves of the property of the mulattoes, either by extermination or by driving them from the Island. At Cape Haytien, ladies were denied passports because they possessed property which they would carry with them. But Soulouque himself does not go fast enough for these brigands. He is suspected, and, it was thought, might fall a victim to the very storm of cupidity and avarice which he has raised.

Fatal Affray.—The Kosciusko (Miss.) Chronicle of the 2d inst. publishes the following:—An affray occurred in Neshoba County, on Sunday last, between some young men named Coglin and others named Morrow, somewhat after the following manner: One of the Coglins and one of the Morrows were attending the same school, Morrow told something to a third person—Coglin asked an explanation—a fight ensued, in which Morrow got the better; threats passed, and young Morrow and three of his brothers went to Coglin's (the father of the young man) house to settle the affair; as usual in such cases, they made the matter worse, and a fight ensued between one of the Morrows, in which Coglin was about to use a bowie-knife, to prevent which one of Morrow's brothers stepped up and discharged a pistol at the head of Coglin, killing him instantly; the others now interfered, the result of which was that one of the Morrows received a stab which has ere this probably proved mortal, and one of the Coglins a severe stab, but of which it is thought he will recover.

Wealth of the Union.—The report of the Patent office, recently made, presents some interesting statistics relative to the wealth of the Union. The population of the United States is set down at 20,746,000, and the aggregate of personal and real property is estimated at $8,295,560,000. New York is the richest State, her property being $1,112,000,000; Pennsylvania next, $850,000,000; then Ohio, $740,000,000; then Virginia, $508,000,000. The remainder of the States rank as follows:—Indiana, $384,000,000; Tennessee, $380,000,000; Kentucky, $342,000,000; Massachusetts, $340,000,000; Georgia, $320,000,000; North Carolina, $306,000,000; Illinois, $294,000,000; Alabama, $276,000,000: Mississippi, $256,000,000; South Carolina, $242,000,000; Missouri, $240,000,000; Maine, $240,000,000; Maryland, $193,000,000; Louisiana, $188,000,000; New Jersey, $166,000,000; Michigan, $148,000,000; Connecticut, $132,000,000; Vermont, $120,500,000; New Hampshire, $120,000,000; Arkansas, $60,000,000; Texas, $56,000,000; Iowa, $52,000,000; Rhode Island, $52,000,000; Wisconsin, $36,000,000; Delaware, $32,000,000; Florida, $30,000,000; District of Columbia, $18,000,000; Oregon, $8,000,000.

From the Emigrants.—The St. Joseph Gazette of the 9th inst. says, Mr. Shaw arrived here on Monday last from Fort John on Platte River. On his way in he met about 300 wagons of Oregon and California emigrants, and 200 wagons of Mormons. All were getting on well. The first company was about 500 miles from the settlements, and the last one about 150 miles. A company of California emigrants, numbering about 60, had a little difficulty with the Pawnees, but no person was injured. From the best information we can gather, the emigration this season to Oregon and California will not exceed 350 wagons—about 1,600 souls. The Mormons are leaving Camp Israel in large numbers, and at this time upward of 600 wagons have left for the Salt Lake. The outbreak among the Indians will not deter them from crossing the plains this season, as they are anxious that all their brethren should get together as soon as possible. Three Mackinaw boats, loaded with robes and furs, passed down to-day. They bring no news from the mountains. The Indians were all quiet.

From Pernambuco.—Capt. Peacock, of the bark Navarre, arrived at Philadelphia June 19, reports that on the night previous to his leaving Pernambuco, as the Circus Company (which left this city some time since in the bark Imogene, for Valparaiso,) were performing to a large and respectable ordiance, the tent was assailed by a turbulent party, who were not content with throwing stones and other heavy missiles, but resorted to firing the tent, by throwing rockets and chasers, several of which struck the canvas, which did not ignite, from the fact of its being wet from a heavy shower of rain. The police immediately sallied forth and chased the assailants into their haunts, which were convenient and sheltered them from arrest. Had the roof of the tent taken fire the loss of life would have been dreadful, as the enclosure where the tent was pitched contained over 1,000 persons and 150 horses, and was surrounded by a well 15 feet in height.

The Hotchkiss Affair.—Edward Bailey, who was sent to Sing Sing for life about a year ago, for an attempted assassination of Mr. Hotckkiss of Brooklyn, has lately attempted to make his escape. Mr. Wells, the principal keeper of the prison, suspected that something was wrong from the manner of Bailey, and upon making diligent search, he found a large number of deadly weapons secreted near his cell. After the discovery Bailey acknowelged that they were made for violent purposes by a number of the convicts, and that it was their intention to create a revolt at the first favorable opportunity. The offenders were all submitted to the punishment of the shower bath. Buchanar, the accomplice of Bailey, died on the 14th inst. of pulmonary consumption. On his death-bed he expressed a deep contrition for his crimes, and refused to see Bailey. Logan, the remaining member of the gang, is said to be in ill health, and will probably live but a short time.

New Counterfeits.—The following new counterfeits have recently been put in circulation: Fives on the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank, Hartford; fives altered from ones, vig. Indian and a female—lady's head on the right end, and a female on the left. Fives on the Danvers Bank, Mass. Twos on the State Bank, Saugerties. Threes on the Agawam Bank, Springfield, Mass. Fifties on the Biddeford Bank, Maine; 50's counterfeit well excuted, but rather pale. Tens on the Bank of Louisville, Ky. Twos on the Bank of Westfield, N. Y. Threes on the Sandusky (O.) City Bank. Fives on the State Bank of Indiana. Tens on the Waltham Bank, Mass. Threes on the Western Reserve Bank, Baltimore. Beware of the spurious notes on the New Haven Co. Bank—the old genuine bills are being called in. Fives on the Mechanics' and Traders' Bank, La. Twos on the Commercial Bank, Kingston, Canada. Threes on the Merchants' Bank, Ellery. Threes on the Bank of Smyrna, Del.

Anti-Slavery Conventions.—The Board of Managers of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society announce their design, in accordance with the resolution of the late New England Convention, to hold one hundred conventions in Massachusetts, with special reference to the imprisonment of Sayers and Drayton for aiding slaves to escape from the District of Columbia. For this purpose $1,200 were raised by the Convention, in donations and pledges. The first Convention to be held at Stoneham. The speakers who advocate the views of this Society are able and eloquent men, who never fail to attract large and intelligent audiences.

Railroad Accident.—Henry McGee, of Westmoreland Co., Pa., came to his death on Tuesday evening from injuries received in falling from the cars on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. He took the evening train proceeding toward Frederick, at Woodbine, and from the statement of the conductor, Mr. William G. Shipley, it appears that he could not prevail on him to keep his seat in the car, but he would stand on the platform. After the train had passed a short distance beyond Ijamsville, he fell from the platform, was caught under the wheels, and had both his legs cut off near the knee. After having undergone an amputation of one of his legs, he died. He was a laborer and supposed to have been intemperate.

Attempt to Kidnap.—A Pittsburg paper says that a girl claimed as the property of a man in the South, and who escaped about a year ago, and came to this city on the steamer Cambria, has been residing in Alleghany for some time. Her master becoming aware of her locality, employed a negro man to make a tender of affection to her, and propose marriage, which duty he performed. The marriage evening was fixed—Wednesday evening. The lover had his plans laid for cajoling the lady off under pretence of celebrating the ceremonies, but in truth his object was, as above stated, to deliver her up to the man who claimed her. The object leaked out on Wednesday, and the girl's friends informed her of the situation in which she was, and her abduction was prevented. The negro man was most severely handled.

Fatal Repast.—The Boston Transcript of the 21st inst., says, We regret to learn, from the Gloucester Telegraph of this morning, that the family of Mr. Thomas Niles, residing at Eastern Point, yesterday partook of a chowder made of clams, and in about twenty minutes after eating, Mr. Niles, his wife, two sons, a daughter, and a lady visiting the family, began to feel the effects of the poison. Edward, the youngest son, about six years of age, showed the first symptoms, and was so badly affected that he died before medical aid could be received. The rest of the family, although seriously affected, we are glad to say are likely to recover.

Wealth of Great Britain.—The whole property of Great Britain, says the Nonconformist, was estimated, nearly thirty years ago, at £3,600,000,000. Since that period its value has increased to between six and seven billions of pounds sterling; so that the national debt of £800,000,000, frightful as it is, is only about one-eighth part of our national wealth. In other words, our assets show a seven-fold surplus over our liabilities.

SUMMARY.

The distinguished Mexican, Almonte, is about to visit the United States with his family, and will probably take up his permanent residence in the City of New Orleans, where he spent much of his youth, and acquired much of the valuable information he possessess. He has lost all his popularity in Mexico, and is thoroughly disgusted with the country. Almonte is considered ahead of his countrymen in light and information, and will, no doubt, feel much more at home in New Orleans, at his old trade of selling hardware, than in dealing with the impracticable races of Mexico.

On Saturday evening the sound of the wheels and engine of the steamer Vanderbilt were heard distinctly at Stonington, Conn., when the boat was ten miles west of Saybrook, or forty miles distant. The sound continued distinct until the boat reached New London, when two gentleman on the wharf at Stonington counted the revolutions of her engine with perfect accuracy. The distance at this time was more than ten miles. This is an interesting fact in the transmission of sound. The air of course was damp, and the wind very light, and westerly.

A few days since a son of Mr. John Thompson, farmer, in Cheltenham township, Montgomery County, about 12 years of age, was milking ing a cow, and being annoyed by the switching of her tail, he tied it around one of his legs. In this condition the animal from some cause became frightened and ran off, over ditches and fences until she became exhausted. When the boy was relieved he was almost lifeless and great doubts existed of his surviving the injuries he received.

A powder mill in Barre, Mass., blew up on Monday afternoon, killing one person, a young man aged from 20 to 22 years. He was blown some ten rods from the building, and every particle of his clothing, except a bit of one of his stockings, stripped from his body, which was blackened like a coal. Lightning is suspected to have caused the explosion, as a severe storm prevailed at the time, and a large tree near by was struck at the moment of the accident to the mill.

The Salem (Mass.) Register says, a little fishing schooner was lying at one of our wharves last week, which deserves notice. She was manned by a veteran crew, consisting of skipper Marshall, aged 78; his brother, aged 76; another man aged 76, and a boy 65. The vessel is 45 years old, and the united ages of the vessel and crew number 340 years! The skipper has followed the pursuit from the age of 9 years.

The New London (Ct.) Chronicle of the 17th inst. says, Edwin Smith, of Groton, employed in painting the spars of the ship Atlantic, lying at Lawrence's wharf, in this city, fell yesterday morning from the foretopmast cross-trees to the deck, striking on his head and breaking his neck. The unfortunate youth lived but about five minutes. He was a fine young man about 18 years of age, greatly beloved by his relations and friends, and whose loss they will all deeply deplore.

The Rochester Courier of June 19 says, Yesterday afternoon the body of young Middlebrook, who jumped the Genesee Falls on Thursday last, was discovered near the spot where he struck, by some persons bathing. It was horribly mutilated and presented a most revolting sight.

The Richmond (Va.) Whig says: "The wheat harvest was commenced last week in this and the neighboring counties, and promises an extensive crop. The country presents a beautiful and most refreshing appearance."

The Boston Traveler of June 17th says, Captain Saunders, of brig Spartan, arrived at this port yesterday, from Surinam, reports that he touched at the Island of Martinique on Sunday, the 28th ult. He brings no later news, but states as to the bloodshed caused by the rebellion, that he heard of but one family killed and two men shot. It was supposed there when he sailed, that the blacks would go to work in a day or two.

Mr. Emmerson Goddard, of Petersham, Mass., has invented a new Spoke Machine, which will turn and tenon 20 spokes in a minute. All that is required is to place the wood on a bench, the large ends all one way. It is self-feeding and self-piling, leaving them when turned in a regular pile on one side of the machine, opposite to the feeding side. The above number turned out per minute, are 23 inches in length. Lasts and fork handles, can be turned in it with nearly the same facility as spokes.

A little animal called the "gropher" is very troublesome to the farmers in the Western States, throwing up mounds to the height of from twelve to fifteen inches. A few days since, the inhabitants of Porter, Wisconsin, had a hunt for the purpose of annihilating all the grophers in that vicinity. Forty men went to work, and succeeded in killing three thousand one hundred and ninety-six grophers.

A most serious accident occurred on Moore's section of the New York and New Haven Railroad, near Norwalk, on Friday. An accidental explosion from a quarry of rocks killed one laborer, literally tearing him in pieces, and wounded two others so that it is feared they will not survive. The hands immediately left the work, and the contractors find great difficulty in replacing them.

Clark Co., Mo., is just now in an unpleasant state of excitement, owing to the abduction of eight slaves, and their detention by citizens of Iowa. As soon as it was discovered, they were pursued and overhauled at West Point, Iowa. A trial was had, and the negroes delivered up, but the mob seized them, drove off their owners, and started with them in the direction of Burlington.

A family in Lancaster County were, a few days since, made very ill by eating of a sponge-cake flavored too highly with 'peach water.' We beg our young housekeepers to beware how they use this very agreeable and common addition to pies, confectionary, &c., as it is but a mild form of that deadly poison Prussic Acid.

So cheap is meat in the colony of Port Phillip that a tallow boiler of Melbourne has placarded that place with an advertisement that he is selling fine legs of mutton at 6d. each, and it is said that he finds it difficult to obtain purchasers even at that price.

The last Logansport Telegraph brings an account of a great freshet in the Wabash and Eel rivers, and the destruction of large quantities of timber. Eel river was higher than it had ever been known to be before. The saw-mills at Logansport lost about 2,000 logs.

A letter from Mexico says: "I am informed that those officers who were sentenced to be hung in the City of Mexico on the 21st ult., Lieuts. Hare, Tilden, and Dutton, are to be dishonorably discharged from the service, and sent out of the country."

It has been officially stated that there are 3,719,000 persons engaged in agricultural pursuits in the United States; in manufactures 781,800; in commerce, 119,600; in learned professions, 65,200; in ocean navigation, 55,000; in internal navigation, 33,000.

Harrisburg, June 22, 1848—Gov. Shunk is again seriously ill. His disease has assumed a new shape, and he appears to be almost in the last stage of consumption. His friends have little hope of his recovery.

John Lyng, who accompanied Capt Cook in his last voyage, and witnessed his being speared by the lances of the Indians, recently died in Greenwich Hospital, at the advanced age of 97.

The accounts of the loss of the Benares, a fine steamer of 400 tons burden, by fire, on her passage from Calcutta, have been confirmed. She had upward of 150 persons on board, of whom, by far the greater number perished.

Barney Slaven murdered his wife Catharine at Niles, Mich., on the 4th inst., by beating her with a shovel. Slaven was an intemperate man. He was committed to await his trial.

The tannery of E. M. & F. Bodine, in Wellsboro, Tioga Co., Pa., was destroyed by fire on the 7th inst. Loss estimated at $5,000; insured to the amount of $3,000.

Mr. Mason Eastman of Saquoit, N. Y., met with his death a few days ago from the kick of a runaway horse which he was pursuing.

DIED,

In Almond, N. Y., Elvira A. Potter, daughter of David R. and Lavinia Potter, aged 13 years 9 months and 6 days. The subject of this notice was an only child, and gave promise of being a blessing to her parents and friends, and an ornament to society She was attacked with typhus fever, and after a sickness of several weeks fell by the hand of our common destroyer. It is a matter of inexpressible joy that she left behind a clear and convincing proof of having passed from death unto life and that she has gone to rest with the ransomed in heaven.

In Alfred, N. Y., June 6, of pulmonary disease, Rogers Crandall, in the 45th year of his age. He was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Friendship. His death was peaceful.

In Alfred, June 15, of hemorrhage of the bowels, Albert Potter, in the 38th year of his age. He was a member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred, and died in hope of eternal life through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. N. V. H.

In Plainfield, Otsego Co., N. Y., June 13, Miss Phebe R. West, aged 23 years. It is no more than justice to the memory of the deceased to say, that she was endeared to her relatives and acquaintances by her amiable disposition and exemplary deportment. In early youth she remembered her Creator, and made an early sacrifice of herself to her Saviour, who, to her, was above all price. She united with the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, and steadfastly maintained her walk with her brethren "in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless." The Church has sustained a severe loss in the death of this sister, but to her, we trust, it is infinite gain.

In Brookfield, N. Y., June 14, Mr. Joel Witter, aged 44 years.

In Leonardsville, N. Y., June 14, Mr. Peter Grants, aged 39 years.

In Petersburg, N. Y., on the 29th inst, of consumption, Z. M. Crandall, son of G. Crandall, aged 47 years.

MISSIONARY NOTICE.

To all whom it concerns:—

In order to carry on the missionary operations of the Eastern Seventh-day Baptist Association, it was resolved to raise the sum of five hundred dollars for the ensuing year. About one-half of the amount is already pledged, and the churches are hereby requested to increase it by their contributions to the above-mentioned sum. The Clerk of each Church is requested, as soon as convenient, to ascertain the amount in which his church will stand pledged, and notify me accordingly. The delegates present at the last Session of the Association are requested to inform their churches relative to our plan of missionary operations the present year.

NOTICE.

Whereas, the Eastern Seventh-day Baptist Association, at its last Annual Session, resolved to hold correspondence through messengers, or its Corresponding Secretary, with her sister Associations, and believing that they would act in concert with us relative to the subject of family prayer, which particularly engaged the deliberations of that body I have deemed it expedient to give publicity in this way to those resolutions which were adopted relative to that subject:

Resolved, That we consider it the duty of every Christian who sustains the responsible relation of the head of a family, to maintain the regular and daily worship of God in his own house; and that the neglect of this duty is a deplorable feature in the character of those professors of religion who are guilty of it, calling for the earnest labors of pastors and ministers to correct the evil.

Resolved, That we recommend pastors and ministers to lay this subject before their respective congregations on the first Sabbath in July.

In behalf of the Eastern Association, I respectfully invite the pastors and ministers of our sister Associations to unite with us on that day in urging the claims of this much-neglected duty; and also to unite with us in earnestly imploring the blessing of Abraham's God (in whom all the families of the earth are blessed) to descend, and erect an altar in every house, from which the morning and evening incense shall daily ascend until the dew of Hermon descends refreshing and reviving all around. ## WHO LIVETH?

BY CALEB LYON, OF LYONSDALE.

It is not he whose sordid soul
Is bound to mercenary shrines,
Whose Gordian knot of worldly weal
His every nobler feeling binds,—
Whose eyes are blind with golden dust,
And never gaze upon the day,—
Whose limbs bear onward to the grave,
A stolid mass of fading clay;

'T is not the hireling from the field,
When music sounds and banners wave,
When heads are hot and hands are strong
To make for each a soldier's grave,
Where conflict rages, till the weak
Are forced at last to yield or fly,
And heroes these that fate reserved,
Of thousands who were paid to die:

'T is not the parasite of Power—
The Sycophant that loves to cling
Around the idol of a day,—
A serpent with a glittering wing,—
Dissimulation in his words,
Dishonor in his winning smile,—
A kind of human misletoe,
That saps the heart it doth beguile;

'T is not the Sybarite, whose lust
Hath turned the harlot in the street—
Whose cup with roses ever crowned,
His gay companions love to greet,—
Whose couch is filled with Eider down,
Whose robe is from the Persian loom;
Life is not his, for Pleasure lives
For aye within a painted tomb.

'T is he who heals the wounded breast,
And wipes away the mourner's tear,—
Whose words of tenderness flow fourth
As fountains in a desert drear,—
Upon whose lip Eternal Truth
Sits 'mid a world of sin and shame,—
Presiding in perpetual youth,
She breathes a dying Saviour's name.

'T is he who stamps upon his brain
The lore of glorious ages fled—
Holding high converse with the Past,
And dwelling with the mighty dead;
Stealing true inspiration's fire
From Suns that never can go down:
Chained to his task with iron zeal,
And wearing Labor's thorny crown.

'T is he who strikes Apollo's lyre,
Whose burning songs can never die,—
That echo through the vast of years,
As angel anthems through the sky;
Who girt by woe, and want, and pain,
In a dark wilderness of years,—
Wins an imperishable name,—
A broken-hearted Man of Tears.

THE RATTLE-SNAKE.

Mr. Audubon and Dr. Bachman have lately published vol. 1 of the letter press of their splendid work, "The Viviparous Quadrupeds of North America." We make the following extract:—

"This snake, the most venomous known in North America, subsists wholly on animal food; it digests its food slowly, and is able to exist without any sustenance for months, or even years, in confinement; during this time it often increases in size, and the number of its rattles is augmented. In its natural state it feeds on rabbits, squirrels, rats, birds, or any other small animals that may come in its way. It captures its prey by lying in wait for it, and we have heard of an instance in which one of these snakes remained coiled up for two days before the mouth of the burrow of the Florida rat, and on its being killed it was found to have swallowed one of these quadrupeds.

"As far as we have been able to ascertain, it always strikes its intended prey with its fangs, and thus kills it, before swallowing it. The bite is sudden, and although the victim may run a few yards after it is struck, the serpent easily finds it when dead. Generally the common species of rattle-snake refuses all food when in a cage, but occasionally one is found that does not refuse to eat while in captivity. When a rat is turned loose in a cage with one of these snakes, it does not immediately kill it, but often leaves it unmolested for days and weeks together. When, however, the reptile, prompted by irritation or hunger, designs to kill the animal, it lies in wait for it, cat-like, or gently crawls up to it, and suddenly gives it the mortal blow, after which, it very slowly and deliberately turns it over into a proper position, and finally swallows it.

"We have seen a rattle-snake, in a very large cage, using every means within its power, and exerting its cunning, for a whole month, before it could succeed it capturing a brown thrush, that was imprisoned with it. At night the bird, roosted beyond the reach of the snake, and during the daytime it was too cautious in its movements, and too agile—snatching up its food at intervals, and flying instantly back to its perch—to be struck by the unwieldy serpent. We now added a mouse to the number of the inmates of the cage; the affrighted animal retreated to a corner, where the snake slowly crawled up to it, with a sudden blow darted his fangs into it; soon after which, he swallowed it. About a week after this adventure, the snake again resumed his attempts to capture the thrush, and pursued it all around the cage. This experiment offered a fair opportunity for the rattle-snake to exert its powers of fascination, had it possessed any; but as it did not exhibit them, we do not hesitate to say that it was entirely destitute of any faculty of the kind. After some hours' fruitless manœuvring, the snake coiled itself up, near the cup of water from which the bird drank. For two days the thrush avoided the water; on the third, having become very thirsty, it showed a constant desire to approach the cup; the snake waited for it to come within reach, and in the course of the day struck at it two or three times; the bird darted out of his way, however, and was not killed until the next day.

"If, notwithstanding these facts, it is argued that the mysterious and inexplicable power of fascination is possessed by the snake because birds have been seen to approach it, and with open wings and plaintive voice, seemed to wait upon its appetite, we must be prepared to admit that the same faculty is possessed by other animals. On a certain day, we saw a mocking-bird, exhibiting every appearance usually, according to descriptions, witnessed when birds are under the influence of fascination. It approached a hog, which was occupied in munching something at the foot of a small cedar. The bird fluttered before the grunter with open wings, uttered a low and plaintive note, alighted on his back, and finally began to peck at his snout. On examining into the cause of these strange proceedings, we ascertained that the mocking-bird had a nest in the tree, from which several of her younglings had fallen, which the hog was eating. Our friend, the late Dr. Wright, of Troy, informed us that he witnessed a nearly similar scene between a cat-bird and a dog, which had disturbed her brood, on which occasion the cat-bird went through many of the movements generally ascribed to the effect of fascination."

COURAGE IN WOMEN.

There is a branch of general education which is not thought at all necessary for women, as regards which, indeed, it is well if they are not brought up to cultivate the opposite. Women are not taught to be courageous. Indeed to some persons, courage may seem as unnecessary for women as Latin and Greek. Yet there are few things that would tend to make women happier in themselves and more acceptable to those with whom they live, than courage. There are many women of the present day, sensible women in other things, whose panic terrors are a frequent source of discomfort to themselves and those around them. Now, it is a great mistake to imagine that hardness must go with courage; and that the bloom of gentleness and sympathy must all be rubbed off by that vigor of mind which gives presence of mind, enables a person to be useful in peril, and makes the desire to assist to overcome that sickliness of sensibility which can only contemplate distress and difficulty. So far from courage being unfeminine, there is a peculiar grace and dignity in those beings who have little active powers of attack or defence, passing through danger with a moral courage which is equal to that of the strongest. We see this in great things. We perfectly appreciate the sweet and noble dignity of a Mary Queen of Scots or a Marie Antoinette. We see that it is grand for these delicately bred, high-natured, helpless personages to meet death with a silence and a confidence like man's.

But there would be a singular dignity to woman's bearing small terrors with fortitude. There is no beauty in fear. It is a mean, ugly, dishevelled creature. No statue can be made of it that a woman would wish to see herself like. Women are pre-eminent in steady endurance of tiresome suffering; they need not be far behind men in a becoming courage to meet that which is sudden and sharp. The dangers and the troubles, too, which we may venture to say they now start at unreasonably, are many of them mere creatures of the imagination—such as in their way, disturb high-mettled animals brought up to see too little, therefore frightened at any leaf blown across the road. We may be quite sure that without losing any of the most delicate and refined graces, women may be taught not to give way to unreasonable fears, which should belong no more to the fragile than the robust.

A HEROIC SAILOR.

The New London (Conn.) Chronicle mentions with commendation, the heroic deeds of a common sailor, on board the ship Robert Bourne, recently arrived at that port:—

As the ship was on her passage from the Sandwich Islands to the North West Coast, she encountered a severe gale of wind, and while laying to under close-reefed main topsail, one of the formast hands, named Henry C. Smith, of Norwich, fell overboard. The sea was so rough that it seemed out of the question to lower a boat. It could not be done without placing in imminent peril any crew that might be ordered on so hopeless a service. Of course the word went instantly through the ship that there was a man overboard, when a Portuguese sailor from the Cape de Verds, named Peter Antoine, who was then below, sprung on deck, and in an instant threw himself from the ship's side and breasted the billows towards the sinking sailor. It seemed impossible that the gallant fellow could sustain himself for any length of time, much less that he could reach and render any assistance to his drowning shipmate. He did, however, by an effort that seemed almost superhuman, succeed in very nearly reaching the spot where Smith had till that time managed to keep his head above water, when just at that moment the poor fellow sunk to rise no more, and Antoine to all human appearances was doomed to follow his fate. Seeing his situation, a determined effort was made to save him. A boat was got over, and a line from it kept on board the ship. Antoine was at last reached, and finally got safely on board.

This same capital fellow performed a like feat, and with better success, on a subsequent part of the voyage. Being with a boat's crew in the surf at Maui, the boat capsized, and one of the crew by the name of John Noonan, was washed off, and being unable to swim, was upon the very point of drowning, when Antoine pitched into the breakers, and bore him alive to the shore. Nor does the record of the brave man's efforts in the cause of humanity close here, though the other instance of his gallant conduct occurred sometime before.

On a previous voyage, some three or four years ago, in the ship Romulus, of Mystic, a sailor fell overboard, and Antoine promptly plunged into the sea, swam for his shipmate, and saved him!

PROJECTED ESCAPE OF BONAPARTE.—It is not generally known that a vessel was undertaken to be built at Batersea, by the renowned Johnson, the smuggler, for the purpose of liberating Bonaparte from the Island of St. Helena. The vessel was about ninety feet long, and of the burden of one hundred tons. It was built of half inch plank; the grain of two such planks were placed in a horizontal position. These planks were so well caulked and cemented together, that the thickness of the sides of the vessel did not exceed that of an ordinary washing tub. The masts were so contrived that they could be lowered with a level of the deck, and the whole vessel might be sunk in shoal water with the crew on board, without danger. Ample means were provided for supplying the vessel with fresh air. The plan was to sail up at night, within a short distance of St. Helena, and sink the vessel until next day or some subsequent night, when Bonaparte would be enabled to make his escape to the beach, at which time the vessel was to be raised, Bonparte to get on board, and sail away in the dark. It happened, however, that Bonaparte died before the vessel was finished, and it is a curious coincidence that she was to be coppered the very day the news of his death arrived. Johnson was to receive £40,000 as soon as the vessel got into blue water, exclusive of the reward to be given in case the enterprise succeeded.

HINT AS TO SCHOOLING.

A common error, into which many parents fall, is to send their children to an inferior school first, and afterwards to place them in an establishment where they may, as it is termed, "finish" their education. Now, not only is the pupil a severe loser by this method, but the master, to whose care he is at length confided, experiences much additional trouble. He has not only now to lead the youth into a right path, but to lead him back from many a wrong one; not merely to urge him to the farther acquisition of good habits, but to endeavor to root out many that are faulty. It is related by Quintilian that those who went to learn music of Timotheus, paid double price if they had received any previous instruction—a safeguard I would recommend to general adoption by good teachers. But there are other evils connected with such a system, not to mention those which result from change of plans to the student himself. It is obvious that no tutor can be expected to take much interest in the progress of children who are placed with him only as a temporary thing. Whereas, if it is understood that they are to continue with him so long as his treatment to them is what it ought to be, he has an incentive to diligence in the highest degree effective. He looks upon them as the future ornaments of his school; and they immediately come under the influence of those well-regulated stimulants which urge them on to fill up the ranks of those who are about to finish their scholastic course. A well-directed establishment, and where the morals, intellectual improvement, and health of the pupils are carefully and assiduously attended to, presents advantages which ought to be appreciated by parents, though they are seldom valued by the pupils. ## EARLY WEEDING—STIRRING THE SOIL.

A great deal is gained by early weeding. When weeds first start they may be easily destroyed, and if the land has been recently plowed and planted, it will be light and mellow; and the hoeing it at an early period requires but little time, compared to what is necessary when the weeds have become large, and almost formed a sward, and the earth has become compact and hard. Another disadvantage in delaying weeding till late, is the hiding of the plants by the luxuriant weeds. In some cases the plants cannot be found without diligent search, and then, perhaps, the weeds cannot be removed without radically disturbing the plants, which from their fragile forms, growing in the shade of tall weeds, can hardly stand alone.

Besides the great saving of labor in weeding early, there is a great advantage to the crops; for most all plants that stand in a good soil, free from weeds, will grow twice as fast for stirring the soil around them. When there are no weeds, plants will come up, grow a little, and then remain almost stationary for weeks, when a little stirring of the soil around them would give them a start and cause a luxuriant growth. This is often shown by part of a row or piece of land being hoed, while another part is left. So great a difference is sometimes produced by merely stirring the soil, that the casual observer has supposed that there was a difference in the manure, time of planting, or something else which he would regard as more important than the mere stirring of the soil, as he would regard it.

We have an account of a trial between two cultivators who competed for the greater success under the same circumstances as to soil, manure, seed, &c. One thought to excel by hoeing his lot twice a week, aware of the great advantage of frequently stirring the soil; but he was much surprised to find that he had been beaten, and was anxious to learn the management of his competitor, which was his own plan carried to a greater extent, for he had hoed his lot every morning.

Farmers will find it profitable to prepare their lands and arrange their plants so that most of the labor in destroying weeds and stirring the soil, so essential to successful cultivation, may be done by animal labor. In this there will not only be saving of expense, but a greater profit by a large crop, for by the use of a cultivator or plow between rows, the soil will be stirred deeper than by the hoe, and it may be done more frequently also. A good steady horse, in a well arranged field, in the hoeing season, will do as much as several men. [Cultivator.

THE MICROSCOPE AND RICHES.—When the oxy-hydrogen microscope was recently shown at the Newcastle Polytechnic exhibition, a poor old woman, whose riches will never retard her ascent to heaven, took her seat in the lecture room, to witness the wonders that were for the first time to meet her sight. A piece of lace was magnified into a salmon net, a flea was metamorphosed into an elephent, other marvels were performed before the venerable dame, who sat in astonishment, staring open-mouthed at the disc. But when, at length, a milliner's needle was transformed into a popular tree, and confronted her with its huge eye, she could hold no longer. "My goodness!" she exclaimed, "a camel could get through that! There's some hope for the rich folks yet!"

CURIOUS ICELANDIC CUSTOM.—The Icelanders have a curious custom, and a most efficient one of preventing horses from straying, which we believe is peculiar to that island. Two gentlemen, for instance, are riding together, without attendance, and wishing to alight for the purpose of visiting some object at a distance from the road, they tie the head of one horse to the tail of another, and the head of this to the tail of the former. In this state, it is utterly impossible that they can move on, either backwards or forwards, one pulling one way and the other another, and therefore, if disposed to move at all, it will be only in a circle, and even then, there must be an agreeament to turn their heads the same way.

◆

WONDERS OF CHEMISTRY.—Aquafortis and the air we breathe are made of the same materials. Linen, and sugar, and spirits of wine are so much alike in their chemical composition, that an old shirt can be converted into its own weight in sugar, and the sugar into spirits of wine. Wine is made of two substances, one of which is the cause of almost all combustion or burning, and the other will burn with more rapidity than any thing in nature. The famous Peruvian bark, so much used to strengthen stomachs, and the poisonous principle of opium, are found of the same materials. [Sc. Am.

VARIETY.

The business of petitioning the Legislature is carried on to a much greater extent in England than in this country. The number of petitions presented to Parliament during the five sessions ending 1837, was 37,183, with 12,118,213 signatures; in the five sessions ending 1842, the numbers were, petitions 70,072, signatures 24,450,909; in the five sessions 1843—47, petitions 81,985, signatures 17,275,981. Total number of petitions presented in the above fifteen years, 189,240; total signatures, 52,845,103.

In California there grows a plant which is used by the people there for washing every description of clothing in cold running water. In using them as soap, the women cut of the roots from the bulbs and rub them on the clothes, and a rich and strong lather is formed which cleanses most thoroughly. To propagate the plant, the bulbs are set in a rich moist soil, and grow most luxuriantly in the soft bottoms of valleys or bordering running streams.

A Michigan orator, speaking of annexation, gives the following as his ideas on the subject: "In regurd to the extension and acquisition of farther territory, 'I would have this portion of God's footstool as a District of Columbia, the planetary system as States, and the fixed stars as Territories, and with Cass for President and Butler for Vice President, I would show you the greatest Government the sun ever shone upon.'"

Take fresh picked strawberries, hull them immediately and add clean sugar, pound for pound,—let them stand an hour or two if you choose, cook them a half an hour or more, or, till the syrup is near a jelly,—put them in glasses and set them in the sun a day or two, then cover tight, keep in a cool dry place. These make one of the most delicate and delicious preserves, and will keep a long time.

India rubber springs for railroad cars have come into use. They have been applied to one of the cars on the Boston and Worcester Railroad and found to work well. Each spring is composed of several circular layers or rings of India rubber, a thin metallic plate of the same size being interposed between each of the layers. The invention is patented.

If the treaty with Mexico is ratified, an extent of new territory equal to 750,000 miles will be added to our already immensely large Republic. The United States will then comprehend about 2,750,000 square miles, embracing almost every climate, as well as vegetable and animal production on the globe.

An old toothless clergyman used to be much bothered by the lesson in which the names of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego so often occur. At last he adopted the expedient of calling them "these three gentlemen," reading thus—"so the king commanded these three gentleman to be cast into the fiery furnace."

There is nothing more ridiculous, than to see tender, hysterical, and vaporish people complaining; and yet perpetually cramming, crying out they are ready to sink on the ground, and faint away, and yet gobbling down the richest and strongest food and highest cordials, to oppress and overlay them quite.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

| | |
|---|---|
| Board, per week, | $1 00 |
| Room-rent, per term, | 1 50 |
| Tuition, per term, | $3 50 to 5 00 |
| Incidental expenses, per term, | 25 |

EXTRAS PER TERM.

| | |
|---|---|
| Piano Forte, | $10 00 |
| Oil Painting, | 7 00 |
| Drawing, | 2 00 |

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

CURIOUS HISTORY OF A SAILOR.

Among the group known as the Caribbean Islands, there is a little spot—in a great atlas, scarcely so large as a pin's head, and in reality a mere dot in the waters which sweep around it—called Sombrero, a naked, desolate, barren, miserable lump of rock, the resort of the seagull, the occasional playground of the turtle, and the scoff of the great billows of the Atlantic, which hurl their unwieldly bodies against it, as if it would take very little to induce them to swallow it up altogether. It offers a striking exception to the character of the surrounding islands; possessing no alluvial soil, no refreshing rivers, or brooks, or springs, no verdant vegetation; nothing, in short, to invite or to favor the residence of man, or to excite anything beyond the incidental notice of the passing vessel. His Majesty's sloop-of-war, the Recruit, on the 13th of December, 1807, was standing towards this unpromising spot, on which the first act in our drama opens. She was about a mile and a half off shore, when, between five and six o'clock in the evening, Captain L——, her commander, came on deck, having just risen from dinner, with a face flushed with wine, and a quick impatience of gesture which portended evil to some one on board. Giving a rapid glance at the dim mass of rock now so near, he hastily summoned the master, and asked, 'What island is this?'

'Sombrero,' was the reply.

'Have we not some thieves on board?'

'Yes, sir, there are two,' answered the master somewhat startled.

'Send up my pistols,' said the captain.

The pistols were accordingly brought up, and after undergoing a careful examination as to their condition for service, were ostentatiously laid on the capstan.

'Now send the ship painter here with a strip of black tarpaulin, and his paint and brushes.'

The master hurried down to execute this strange order, while the crew forward were gathered into little knots, each inquiring of the other what all this could mean. Presently the painter appeared, with his tools and the piece of canvass in his hand.

'Take your brush and paint the word THIEF on that piece of canvass; paint it in large letters!' exclaimed the captain.

With a hand not altogether the steadiest, and, under the fierce eye of the commander, not improving in steadiness, the man proceeded to his task. The five letters of shame soon, however, glared from the canvass; and although not exactly conspicuous for perpendicular and rectangular accuracy of outline, they were plain enough for the purpose; and after completing his work, the man gladly received permission to go below.

'Now send Robert Jeffery up here; lower the ship's boat, and let her crew get ready to take her off to the shore yonder,' shouted the captain, who had already worked himself up into a towering passion.

Robert Jeffery, a lad of eighteen, soon came on deck, little dreaming cf the terrible sentence he was about to receive. He was dressed in a blue jacket and trousers, and he held his hat in his hand; but he had neither shoes nor stockings. Giving a significant glance at his pistols, the captain said to him—'Jeffery, do you see that island? I am going to land you on it.'

The poor fellow looked astonished, but dared not offer any remonstrance. 'Never mind his things,' thundered the captain to one of the men who was endeavoring hastily to gather together a few necessary articles for the lad. He was cast out of the ship without provisions, without shoes, without a covering beyond the clothes he wore; and in this destitute condition was rapidly rowed ashore, half-stupified at the suddenness and severity of his fate. Upon his back was sewn the strip of canvass which published his crime. The lad was naturally of a weak, nervous, retiring temperament, and had always been somewhat of a skulker on board. His feelings now overwhelmed him, and he continued crying bitterly until the boat reached the shore. It was now quite dark, and therefore necessary that the crew should immediately return to the ship. Leaving Jeffery on the desolate rocks, after bidding him a hasty farewell, they got into the boat, and were soon at the ship's side. The boat was hauled up, and the Recruit made all sail from the spot where she had left one of her men to perish.

Leaving Jeffery to his fate, let us follow the ship. Directing her course to Barbadoes, she there joined the admiral's squadron. But the hard-hearted act of her captain being whispered about, it at length came to the admiral's ears, and he, after severely reprimanding him for his cruelty, commanded him immediately to return and look for the man. Two months had passed since he was set on shore, when the Recruit again hove in sight of this melancholy island. The commander hastily dispatched a boat to the shore, with the same commanding officer and men who had landed his victim. At this visit it was broad daylight, and now they saw to what a dreadful tomb their captain had consigned Jeffery two months previous. After a long search, nothing was discovered of Jeffery. But a rude tomahawk handle was picked up by one of the men, and to their dismay a tattered pair of trousers by another. Again and again they explored the rocks, dividing, and uniting and searching every hole and corner; but they found nothing more. They at length returned, and reported the fruitless result of their expedition to their anxious captain; and the news rapidly spread among the men, who, on hearing of the tomahawk handle and the trousers, were unanimous in the conviction that Jeffery had perished, and probably by a violent death.

Captain L—— on his return stated to the admiral, as his conviction, that the lad was safe and must have been picked up by some passing vessel. The admiral was satisfied, and suffered the matter to rest. After a lapse of two years, circumstances caused the subject to be again agitated, and sufficient grounds were shown for the appointment of a court martial. Witnesses were examined, and in the defence no attempt was made to deny the fact that Jeffery was left upon the island; but it was pleaded that he was an infamous character, and had committed theft while on board. The circumstances of the theft, however, proved to be of such a character as to diminish the guilt. It appeared that after the Recruit sailed for the West Indies, her stock of water ran low; the crew were allowanced to a certain quantity daily; and he becoming very thirsty, went on Saturday evening to the beer cask, and drew off about two quarts of spruce beer into a bucket, drinking about three-fourths of the quantity, and leaving the remainder. This was his crime. The verdict of the court was unanimous in condemning the captain, and he was immediately dismissed from service.

Whoever will turn to the 'Times' newspaper for February 13, 1810, will find under the head 'court martial' a few particulars of this singular case; and it will be seen that the public excitement on the subject was extreme. The verdict against captain L—— received the entire approbation of the country. So far an act of justice was signally rendered; but where was the victim in the mean while? Was he dead or alive? Had he been killed, or killed himself, or been devoured, or starved, or drowned, or rescued? Upon a motion by a popular leader in the House of Commons, farther inquiries about his fate were immediately set on foot. Official instructions were forwarded to our plenipotentiary in the United States; for the report went that an American ship had rescued him. The proper steps were taken, and the result was as follows:—At a town of the name of Marblehead, near Boston, in Massachusetts, the lost Robert Jeffery was said to have been discovered. He was immediately taken before a magistrate, and being interrogated, gave the facts correctly as stated above, and that he was rescued by an American vessel, and landed at a port in Massachusetts. This declaration was signed with a cross. It was transmitted to England, and appeared at once in all the newspapers.

This, it may be thought, was the end of the matter. But far otherwise. Robert Jeffery had a mother 'yet alive.' She had perused with the utmost anxiety the declaration thus officially set forth, and she immediately addressed a letter to the public journals, which rekindled all the previous uncertainty. Therein she solemnly declared her conviction that the declaration thus made, was, if not wholly a fabrication, at any rate not made by her own son, but by some one who had been suborned to personate her unfortunate child. The most remarkable circumstance in confirmation of this opinion was the fact that the papers signed Robert Jeffery were marked with a cross, as is usual with persons who cannot write their name; whereas it was averred that Jeffery was a good scholar, and it was unlikely that he should pretend ignorance of the art of writing.

The public now appeared determined to bring by any means the whole subject to an issue, and to obtain information as to whether the lad was really dead, or was yet living. Those in authority found that it was high time to take some decisive step to decide the question; and in a short time a ship, under the command of a captain in the navy, was on her way to Boston with the necessary documents, to find out the young man, and, if living, to bring him home. At length the vessel returned, to put a final end to suspense as to the man's destiny. The notice of her arrival was accompanied by the following announcement in the 'Morning Post' newspaper:—

'Jeffery, the seaman, was this day discharged from the navy, by order of the lords commissioners of the Admiralty. He was immediately brought on shore, and set off for London?'

Thus was this long-pending and much-agitated question finally settled by the appearance of the young man himself. A thousand inquiries were now of course put to him about his adventures; to most of which the following narrative was the answer:—

At first he was altogether unable to believe that it was intended to abandon him in that destitute condition, upon an island, which the men who brought him there knew to be uninhabited and unproductive. Vain hope! He saw her white sails unfurling and filling out with wind, and perceived that the distance between her and the island was rapidly increasing; and then, as she became a speck on the mighty waters, then only did he give himself up to overwhelming despair as the awful reality of his fate came home to his mind. She vanished in the horizon, and he saw her no more. For two whole days he suffered dreadfully from thirst, and deeply, though less distressingly, from the cravings of hunger. To allay the fever which consumed him, he drank a considerable quantity of salt water, which, however, only rendered his sufferings more intense. Death was now before him, when most providentially a refreshing shower of rain fell, and the quantity which remained in the crevices of the rocks supplied him so long as he remained on the island. But he was at some difficulty in drinking it; for it lay in such shallow pools, or in such narrow fissures, that it was at first perplexing how to avail himself of the precious gift. The idea at length entered his mind of sucking it out with a quill; and as the island abounded in birds, he was at no loss to find one suitable for his purpose. Inserting one end of this into the crevices, he was able to suck sufficient to quench his thirst, feeling inexpressibly grateful for this most opportune blessing. But nature now renewed her other calls upon him, and was imperative in her demands for food. How to supply this want he knew not, nor could he think of any means of doing so. He saw a great number of birds of the gull kind, rather larger than a goose, and attempted to catch some, but in vain. He then hunted for their eggs, but he could only find one, which had probably lain there for months, for it was in such an offensively putrid state, that, fainting as he was from inanition, he could not touch it. The only food he had, if it could be called food, was some bark, which he was so fortunate as to find cast upon the sea-shore. At length, greatly to his joy, he saw a vessel in the distance. With an exulting heart he watched her emerge, sail after sail, from the blue horizon. When her hull rose above the line, he was half wild with delight; and plucking forth his handkerchief, he waved it incessantly, every minute expecting some signal to indicate that he had been perceived. The great ship, with her load of wealth and life, took no heed of the poor outcast, and 'passed by on the other side,' at a distance too great for him to be discerned by those on board. Another and another ship hove in sight, and passed away, leaving him to his tears, and hunger, and despair. Altogether, five vessels were descried by him, each leaving him more cast down and nearer death than before. He had now despaired of rescue; and fainting through hunger, he sank down upon the shore. But relief was at hand. An American vessel, passing nearer the island than usual, was hove to at the command of the captain, in order that he might examine the birds which were flying in great numbers around it. On landing, the men discovered our perishing seaman, carried him in all haste to the boat, conveyed him on board, and by kind judicious treatment speedily restored him to perfect health. He was thus delivered from his imminently perilous situation, conveyed to Marblehead, where his story excited at once the indignation and active compassion of the people, who soon supplied him with clothes, work, and wages. There he had peaceably spent this interval of time; and while England was ringing with his name, he was pursuing his humble occupation, wholly ignorant of the tumult his case was exciting at home.

Immediately on his arrival in London, Robert Jeffery became one of the metropolitan lions, and was for some time visited by crowds of persons, much to his pecuniary advantage.

The meeting between Jeffery and his mother was particularly interesting. At first she gazed upon him with a kind of bewildered anxiety, as if doubtful whether she could trust what she saw. Her son that was dead was alive again, 'he that was lost was found.' In a few moments she recovered herself, and they rushed into each other's arms.

In concluding this curious history, we wish we could authoritatively explain what may seem to require clearing up. We have heard that the tomahawk handle turned out to be part of a fisherman's hatchet; and it was surmised that the tattered trousers never belonged to Jeffery at all. Perhaps the signing with a mark was the effect of momentary caprice. Beyond this, after a diligent search, we are unable to discover any explanation of the circumstances which, for the time being, produced so much perplexity. If this had been a fiction, it would have been easy to have invented a key to the lock; as it is, we leave it to our readers, with the simple assurance that the narrative, in all its particulars, is exactly as it is to be found in the newspapers of the period.

LAMARTINE AND HIS MOTHER.

In the beautiful month of May, 1832, Lamartine, with his wife and one child, sailed from that part of France which borders on the Mediterranean, from that city where, forty years before, was first sung the famous "Marseilles hymn," for the purpose of visiting "those deserts where the angel pointed out to Hagar the hidden spring, whence her banished child, dying with thirst, might derive refreshment—those rivers which flowed from the terrestrial paradise—the spot in the firmament at which the angels were seen ascending and descending Jacob's ladder." A desire to visit the holy land had burnt in his bosom from the time he was eight years old, and in accounting for that desire, he incidentally introduces the following notice of his mother and her early instructions:

"My mother had received from hers, on the the bed of death, a beautiful copy of the Bible of Royaumont, which she taught me to read when I was a little child. This Bible had engravings on sacred subjects in every page; they depicted Sarah, Tobit and his angel, Joseph, and Samuel; and above all those beautiful patriarchal scenes, in which the solemn and primitive nature of the East was blended with all the arts of the simple and wonderful lives of the fathers of mankind. When I had repeated my lesson well, and read with only a fault or two the half page of historical matter, my mother uncovered the engraving, and holding the book open on her lap, showed and explained it to me as my recompense. She was endowed by nature, with a mind as pious as it was tender, and with the most sensitive and vivid imagination; all her thoughts were sentiments, and every sentiment was an image. The sight of these engravings, and the poetical commentaries of my mother inspired me, from the most tender infancy, with a taste and inclination for biblical lore."

Mothers, see here the importance of attention to your children; See the permanency of early impressions. See the importance of biblical instruction. The mother of Lamartine, as she sat daily with a benignant countenance, and glowing heart, imparting simple Bible lessons, to a a simple-hearted boy before her—did not know, probably did not imagine, that she was forming a heart whose pulsations were to guide the heart of "the mother of ideas—la France," and to extend through Europe, and to all the most important nations of the earth. But time has passed on, and that boy has come to be the man on whom at this moment hangs the destinies of Europe more, perhaps, than any other man, unless it be Nicholas, the ruler of 60,000,000 subjects.

"WAIT FOR THE MORNING."

BY MISS S. H. BROWNE.

Watcher! 'tis dark, and thy dwelling is lonely—
The night-lamp shines dimly, and so does thine eye;
Thou art thinking thy portion is weariness only,
And thou wilt be glad when 'tis thy turn to die!
Watcher, look out! where the day-star is dawning—
Hope in thy heart let its promise awake,
And tireless and slumberless, "wait for the morning:"
Never a night but its morning shall break!

Wanderer! 'tis dark, and the tempest is roaring—
Roaring above thee and rattling around;
Demons of terror their vials are pouring
Right on thy pathway where pitfalls abound!
Wanderer, 'tis better to bow than to bide it—
Harmlessly o'er thee the storm-king shall ride!
Deep is the chasm, 'twere death to bestride it,
But yon is a valley both sloping and wide!

Weeper! 'tis dark, for the angel of sorrow
Hath spread o'er thy landscape the gloom of his wing;
No hue from the rainbow thy sadness can borrow,
No joy to thy bosom the springtime can bring.
Weeper, despair not, there is that can cure thee!
Yes—even to the heartsick, a balm can be given,
A draught that shall comfort and gladness insure thee;
Drink deeply—drink oft, for the fount is in heaven!

Oh, ye who are suffering and toiling and sighing;
Oh, ye who in darkness are groping your way:
Who are weary of hoping and weary of trying,
Who are sure that the midnight will never be day—
I charge ye take heed to this counsel and warning,
Stand fast by your duty, your God and your right!
And patient and truthful, thus wait for the morning,
Assured it shall bring you both healing and light!

EDUCATION OF THE YOUNG.

Children should be early taught to look up and find their standard of life far above the common throng. They should not be taught to rest contended in inactivity, or that Providence would have been satisfied with any small attainments so long as higher attainments are within the reach of their utmost efforts. Providence calls no child to sit down in the dust and amuse itself with playthings as glow-worms and snail shells. They are called to higher spheres—to soar among the stars, to roam o'er mountain tops, to penetrate the depths, and to commune with angels. They are called upon to rise higher and still higher, never resting satisfied until they have placed their feet above all former foot-prints, and carved their names above all other names. "Excelsior" should ever be the motto. He who looks upon the children in our streets fast growing, many of them, to be vagabonds and pests in society, and is satisfied, either is deaf to the voice of duty and of God, or he is guilty of basely disregarding that voice. He, only, who is willing to labor for the elevation of the rising race—to guide them into spheres of improvement and usefulness, and to foster within them a disposition to run the race for honorable meritorious distinction, is a true patriot. He, only, is true to his nature, true to posterity, true to his country, true to his God.

KEEP YOUR PROMISES.

We have often been shocked at the reckless disregard which many persons manifest for the fulfillment of their promises. They are ever ready to make engagements for the future, but when the times arrives for their fulfillment, they seem to have forgotten them entirely, or at least, to treat them as though they involved no obligation whatever. Such conduct is sinful in the highest degree, and when indulged in by professing Christians, furnishes glaring evidence of essential defect in their Christian character. It is also highly injurious in its influence upon society itself, inasmuch as it necessarily tends to destroy that confidence of man in man, which is so essential to the happiness of the community. It is especially detrimental to the interest of the individual himself, who is guilty of it, as he thereby forfeits the confidence and respect of his fellows. His word accordingly, is not relied upon, and he is obliged to suffer all the unhappy consequences. This sinful and injurious habit is one of the most inexcusable of which any one can be guilty. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred there is no absolute necessity whatever for any one to break his word. No one should ever make a promise, unless he looks well into the circumstances beforehand, and has every reason to believe, that it will be in his power to fulfill his promise. And whenever a promise has once been made, it should be his fixed determination to keep it, and with a particular reference to this, his subsequent conduct should be shaped. Were this course to be faithfully pursued, not only would the serious evils resulting from a disregard to one's word be avoided, but also the confidence of those around speedily gained and enjoyed, and a character thereby eventually established, that will be of more value than "ermine, gold, or princely diadems."

As is should be.—Many years since, when the Lieut. Gov. Phillips, of Andover, Massachusetts, was a student at Harvard College, owing to some boyish freak, he quit the University and went home. His father was a grave man, of sound mind, strict judgment, and of few words. He inquired into the matter but deferred expressing any opinon until the next day. At breakfast he said, speaking to his wife, "My dear, have you any tow-cloth in the house suitable to make Sam a frock and trowsers?" She replied, yes. "Well," replied the old gentleman, "follow me, my son." Samuel kept pace with his father as he walked near the common, and at length ventured to ask, "What are you going to do with me, father?" "I am going to bind you an apprentice to that blacksmith," replied his father; "take your choice; return to college, or you must work." "I had rather return," said the son. He did return, confessed his fault, was a good scholar, and became a respectable man. If all parents were like Mr. Phillips, the students at our colleges would prove better students, or the nation would have a plentiful supply of blacksmiths.

AVOID THE PROFANE.

Perhaps there is no bad company to which boys are more exposed, than the profane, and none which is more corrupting. Young people insensibly fall into the habits of those with whom they associate. If they hear them interlard their conversation by words and oaths, they will be strongly tempted to do the same. They will begin, perhaps, with bye-words and little oaths, which show a disposition to be profane, without the outrage to carry it out. But they will not long stop here. They will soon overcome the chidings of conscience, and then they can be as foul mouthed as any of their companions. This vice hardens the heart, and prepares it for every other; for he who despises God will despise man. He who takes the name of God in vain, will not hesitate to break all his commandments. Profaneness is one of the meanest of all vices. It involves everything that is little and mean. It is treating with the utmost indignity our greatest Benefactor. It is a kind of gratuitous wickedness, for there is no motive for it but a disposition to do evil. The profane boy is a dangerous companion. He will lead you into you know not what mischief and difficulty. The best way is to avoid him. If you go with him, he will, most likely, lead you to ruin.

FAITH AND WOKKS.

A person who had peculiar opinions touching the "full assurance of faith," having occasion to cross the ferrry, availed himself of the opportunity to interrogate the boatman as to the grounds of his belief, telling him that if he had faith he was certain of a blessed immortality. The man of the oar said he had always entertained a different notion of the subject, and begged to give an illustration of his opinion. "Let us suppose," said the ferryman, "that one of those oars is call faith, and the other works, and try their several merits." Accordingly, throwing down one oar in the boat, he proceeded to pull the other oar with all his strength, upon which the boat turned round and made no way. "Now," said he, "you perceive faith won't do, let us try if works can." Seizing the other oar, and giving it the same trial, the same consequences ensued. "Works," said he, "you see, won't do either; let us try them together." The result was successful; the boat shot through the waves, and soon reached the wished for haven. "This," said the honest ferryman, "is the way by which I hope to be wafted over the troubled waters of this world to the peaceful shores of immortality." [Youth's Mag.

BIBLE ILLUSTRATIONS.

"Friend, lend me three loaves," would be thought unreasonable by a Yankee; but sit down at an Arab table, and he will put before you, to this day, three loaves, thin and small, as the proportion of one man. That is a custom that has come down to this day. Shepherds on Mount Tabor to this day, convey the lambs in their arms; and how forcibly, to one who sees them, comes home the language of the word of God, "He shall carry the lambs in his bosom." So of various passages of the Old Testament. "How pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity—as the dew of Hermon, the dew that descended upon Mount Zion," says the Psalmist. This is obscure when we consider that Mount Hermon is at a great distance from Jerusalem. Yet one who visits that land will find that when the wind blows from that direction it brings from Mount Hermon to Jerusalem a most cooling and refreshing moisture in the air. [Rev. S. L. Pomroy.

LYING.

This is one of the earliest developements of human depravity. All the children are tempted to commit this sin—and the propensity to it is very strong. Too many parents encourage their children in this by their own example. So "they go astray, speaking lies." They deceive their children—lie to them to make them obedient, but children at length find out the deception. The effect upon the character of children is exceedingly pernicious. They lie to their parents—to each other—to their school fellows—to their teachers. As they grow up, they commit this sin in the streets, on the wharves, behind the counter, in the counting-room; when they buy and when they sell. The sin is perpetrated, in one form or another, almost every day in the year. We would not affirm it of every body—but it is so common, so universal, that but little is thought of it.

Beautiful Sentiment.—That was a beautiful idea of the wife of an Irish schoolmaster, who, while poor himself, had given gratuitous instructions to his poor scholars, but when he increased in worldly goods he began to think that he could not give his services for nothing: "James, don't say the like o' that," said the gentle-hearted woman, "don't—a poor scholar never come into the house that I don't feel as if he brought fresh air from heaven with him. I never miss the bite I give them; my heart warms at the soft homely sound of their bare feet on the floor, and the door almost opens of itself to let them in."

Be True.—How striking those words of old George Herbert: "Lie not," neither to thyself, nor man, nor God. Let mouth and heart be one; beat and speak together; and make both felt in action. It is for cowards to lie. Lies are offspring of fear, and slaves to it, spit them forth amid the stormy workings of the soul in froth. How like a living thing this truth, as in a gem, shines out as George Herbert sang it two centuries ago:

"Lie not, but let thy heart be true to God;
Thy mouth to it, thy actions to them both,
Cowards tell lies, and those that fear the rod;
The stormy working soul spits lies in froth,
Dare to be true. Nothing can need a lie,
A fault, which needs it most grows two thereby."

THE WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Western Association met at Richburg, Allegany Co., N. Y., on fourth-day, June 21, 1848. Eld. Leman Andrus preached the Introductory Discourse. He took for his text the message to the angel of the church in Sardis, contained in the third chapter of Revelation, and endeavored to show from it the importance of humility and devotion on the part of individual members to the prosperity of the church.

After the discourse, a committee was appointed to nominate officers, who in due time made a report, when the following officers were elected:—

Moderator—LEMAN ANDRUS, of Lockport.
Secretaries { THOS. E. BABCOCK, of Independence,
ERASTUS A. GREEN, of Alfred.

Letters from the Churches.

The letters from the churches, which were read immediately after the election of officers, contained some very cheering, and some rather mournful statements. The Hartsville and Scio churches, and we believe one or two others, have enjoyed precious revivals since the meeting of the Association last year. Besides this, nearly all of the churches manifest a growing interest in our missionary and denominational operations. Still there is a lack of that fervor and piety which is necessary to the peace and growth of the churches. In one or two instances, as at Ulysses, Pa., serious difficulties have arisen, to mar the enjoyment of God's people, and prevent their exerting that influence which they ought to exert. The statistics show a slight decrease in the number of members since the previous report. This circumstance indicates that there is something wrong, and calls for humiliation and renewed consecration on the part of all the members of the churches. Many of the delegates seemed to feel it so, and will no doubt endeavor to awaken their brethren to a consideration of the facts of the case, and the admonition they ought to administer.

Missionary Operations.

The missionary operations within the bounds of the Association have been continued throughout the year, although not with that regularity or to so great an extent as was expected. The plan adopted is to assist the feeble churches by occasional missionary visits from brethren who are stationed over the larger churches. At the last meeting of the Association, Eld. Rowse Babcock was appointed to labor in Potter Co., Pa.; but he afterwards removed to Scio, Allegany Co., and has labored principally in that vicinity. Eld. Thomas E. Babcock was also appointed to labor in a field contiguous to his former residence, but was prevented from fully carrying out the appointment by his removal to Independence. Eld. Henry P. Greene was appointed to visit Hebron and Ulysses, Pa., once a month during the year, which he has partially complied with. Eld. Leman Andrus has also labored to some extent in Niagara Co. During the coming year it is proposed to have missionary labor performed in the feeble churches equal to that of one man. Eld. Leman Andrus is to labor in Clarence and vicinity; Hiram P. Burdick in Ulysses and Hebron; Rowse Babcock on Knight's Creek; and James Bailey on Bell's Runn.

Report on the State of Religion.

We give this report entire, instead of preparing an abstract of it, because we presume our readers generally will be glad to see an extract from each of the letters to the Asssociation:—

The Committee on the State of Religion is under the painful necessity of reporting that a perusal of the letters from the churches evinces a state of declension and spiritual leanness which should arouse us to a serious and timely consideration of our condition as churches of our Lord Jesus Christ. It will be observed, that there is in some districts a great "dearth of the word;" also that dissensions and divisions have prevailed in some of the churches to a mournful extent; and that whilst union is reported in most of the churches, but few revivals have occurred. Your Committee are of the opinion, that upon examination the whole number of memberships in the Association will be found less than the previous year. In justification of the above opinion, your Committee would offer the following extract, of letters from the several churches:—

1st Alfred.—We cannot, in sending you our annual report, cheer you with the intelligence of any great ingathering from the ranks of the enemy, though considerable interest has been felt among us, and a few have been added to our number.

Wirt.—We have evidently been declining in religious enjoyment for the year past. We have been but partially supplied with the preaching of the word, and instead of girding on our armor more closely, we have let it hang more loosely about us, and some we fear have laid it down entirely.

Clarence.—We have no very cheering intelligence to communicate to you, yet we feel steadfast in the cause of God.

Independence.—During the past year no great changes have taken place relative to our religious condition. As a church we labor under many discouraging circumstances.

Scio.—We yet, through the long-suffering, goodness, and mercy of God, maintain a visibility as a church, and think we can say that peace and harmony dwell with us.

3d Genesee.—As a church we enjoy a good degree of union, but regret that we do not enjoy more of the life and power of religion.

Ulysses.—We have been made sensible, during the past year, that trials and afflictions are the lot of the people of God. Yet, though we have been severely tried, we feel that we have not been forsaken; though cast down, yet not destroyed.

Pendleton.—We are glad that we can say to you, that we are blessed with union among ourselves, and remain steadfast in the principles of our profession.

Hartsville.—We have enjoyed a precious revival during the past year; saints have been revived, backsliders reclaimed, and sinners converted.

Friendship.—Though we have experienced no special intervention of the Holy Spirit, yet we humbly hope that the word has been like bread cast upon the waters, that shall ere long be seen.

2d Alfred.—We deeply regret that we cannot communicate the cheering intelligence which characterized our letter of last year. The Church is not in a healthy condition. We fear that our spirituality has declined exceedingly, and that as a consequence brotherly love and charity do not rule and reign in our hearts as they should.

1st Genesee.—Although we are free from internal commotion, and our Sabbath meetings are generally well attended, yet there is not that ardent devotion to the cause of Christ which ought to characterize his humble and devoted followers.

2d Genesee.—We cannot convey the soul-cheering intelligence we could wish, yet we desire to become more active in the cause in which we are engaged.

Hebron.—Since our last report we have passed through many trials and afflictions. Still there are many among us who are striving for the upbuilding of Zion.

Amity represent themselves as being in a more flourishing and prosperous condition.

Ministerial Education.

At the meeting of the Association last year, a committee was appointed, consisting of N. V. Hull, J. H. Cochran, L. Andrus, W. C. Kenyon, and T. E. Babcock, to confer with brethren in different parts of the denomination, and with their help prepare a course of studies and reading which they would recommend to condidates for the gospel ministry. The Committee had not completed the task assigned them, and were directed to continue their inquiries, and report at the next meeting of the Association. The importance of thorough ministerial education is more generally acknowledged among us now than formerly—a circumstance in which every friend of our cause ought heartily to rejoice. Another circumstance in which they ought to rejoice, is, that many comparatively educated young people are growing up in the churches, among whom are some who look forward to the ministry as their field of labor. Well would it be for the churches if these young men could receive such assistance and direction as would enable them to go forward in their work of preparation, and conduct them to proper results. The best course of study for them to pursue, and the means most likely to assist them in pursuing such a course, are questions of vast moment, and it is hoped that the Committee will have the benefit of whatever light their brethren may possess. Do we need a College and Theological School of our own, or shall we leave the training of our young men to the institutions of others? Shall we do something to help young men who are anxious to become fully prepared for the work, or shall we leave them to grapple alone with pecuniary embarrassments, and perhaps give up their early resolution to be thorough in the work of preparation? These are questions of importance, which were discussed to some extent in the Association, and are daily being discussed by those who are directly connected with the cause of education among us. This Committee have a great task before them, and one upon the right performance of which hang incalculable interests.

The Proposed Publishing Establishment.

The plan for the formation of a Publishing Establishment, at which all the printing and publishing for the denomination shall be done, and the profits of which shall be applied towards the benevolent operations of the denomination, was laid before the Association by Lucius Crandall, and very thoroughly discussed. The subject was new to most of the delegates, and of course a great many questions were raised and had to be answered as to the present condition of our publishing interests, and the probable working of a new arrangement. After a full consideration of the subject, we believe the convention proposed by the Eastern Association was unanimously approved. It is believed that an establishment cantrolled by Trustees appointed in different sections of the denomination, and enjoying the confidence of the whole people, will stand a much better chance of extensive usefulness than anything we have yet had, and all without danger of loss. It has been considered by the Eastern, Central, and Western Associations, and they have appointed three delegates each, to meet at New Market, N. J., in September next, two days previous to the Anniversaries of the Missionary and Tract Societies, to arrange the best plan for accomplishing the object. The delegates already appointed are Lucius Crandall, Thomas B. Stillman, and David Dunn, of the Eastern Association; Eli S. Bailey, Wm. B. Maxson, and James Bailey, of the Central Association; N. V. Hull, Leman Andrus, and John A. Langworthy, of the Western Association. It is hoped, also, that the subject will come before the other two Associations in time for them to take some action upon it.

Resolutions.

A committee was appointed for the purpose of reporting a series of resolutions designed to bring to the attention of the Association some subjects which need or deserve to be kept constantly before the people. We are not prepared to give a satisfactory report of even the substance of the speeches upon them, and can therefore only state the object of the resolutions, and say that they were spoken to with much animation and interest. There was a resolution commending the operations of the Missionary Association to the confidence and support of the churches; another in favor of the Tract Society; a third commending the Sabbath Recorder to support; a fourth urging the maintainance of the concert of prayer for missions on the first Sabbath in each month; and a fifth setting forth the anti-Christian character and tendencies of secret societies, and recommending the churches to protest against any connection of their members with such societies. Among the speakers upon these resolutions were N. V. Hull, L. Andrus, J. Bailey, L. Crandall, Mr. Cherryman, G. B. Utter, Mr. Davis, and Mr. Coon—all of whom were listened to attentively, and some with unusual manifestations of satisfaction.

During the session of the Association, Bro. H. P. Burdick was examined, at the request of the Hartsville Church, in reference to his qualifications for the ministerial office; and the arrangements for his ordination were referred to the Church. Eld. B. F. Robbins, formerly a Baptist preacher, but more recently a Sabbath-keeper and preacher to the Church in Friendship, was examined by the presbytery as to his doctrinal views, and afterwards received the hand of fellowship from the Moderator. Two missionary collections were taken up on the Sabbath, that after the first sermon for the Foreign Mission, and that after the second sermon for the Home Mission. By the avails of the Foreign Mission collection, Mrs. Wardner is to be made a life-member of the Missionary Association. The next meeting of the Association is to be held with the 1st Alfred Church—J. Bailey to preach the Introductory Discourse; T. E. Babcock alternate. G. B. U.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY—NO. 3.

MENTAL POWER REQUISITE.

Among the qualifications which the Apostle required of those who should enter the Christian ministry is this, viz., that they should be "apt to teach." It is obvious to every-day observation, that a man may be eminently pious with very small mental powers; neither able to acquire much knowledge, nor to impart what he does know. What can such an one do in the office of instructor to others? In secular matters, where such talents are required, no one ever thinks of putting integrity alone for a sufficient qualification; and it would appear, from the Apostle's instructions to Timothy and to Titus, that the Holy Spirit never judged piety alone a sufficient qualification for the office of the ministry. Our own judgement is, that some acuteness of mind, skill in argument, power of illustration, clearness of apprehending, and facility in explaining truth, are imperatively required in every candidate for this office. Farther, it is obvious that the mental powers already enumerated may be possessed in a very respectable degree, and yet leave radical defects in the qualifications for a public teacher. Great acuteness of perception and judgment are often combined with a frigid temperament that as effectually shuts up the soul from communication as frost does the most fertile soils from the power of vegetation; such an one's discourses lack the energy and earnestness requisite to interest and convict. The mere conception of things is not enough to make a teacher of others. Knowledge is one thing, the power of communicating it, and communicating it impressively, is another; the former is very important, but without the latter it will avail but little in the office of the ministry. We are aware, of course, that congregations vary in magnitude, intelligence, modes of thinking, and in the degrees of mental and moral culture; and therefore require a diversity of gifts, and open up opportunities for ministers of a considerable variety of mental characters. This too all requires gratitude to the great Giver of every perfect gift, that there should be a corresponding variety in the ministry to meet it. All these varieties, however, do not lessen the force of our argument for a high order of mental power as requisite for the Christian ministry; they strengthen it. The relation of the preacher to his audience is the same, whatever may be the order of their minds; whether they are plain people, or polished, he is still to be their instructor and guide. The object is the same—it is to convict, and to lead men to act; to act for God, and eternity. In the accomplishment of this object, he must reach the understanding, and move the affections; he must therefore be possessed of the powers of argument, and of imagination, sufficient to move his audience. These need to be well combined to produce the best effects. Powers of argument may do for the statement [illegible] defense of truth; a powerful imagination may interest and fascinate a congregation; but neither alone subdues the heart. The religion of the Bible takes the whole man captive, the judgment and the affections must all be subjected unto Christ. Some people have a fine theory about receiving religious truth from any pious man, however uttered; few, however, act out this fine theory; somehow or other, these good people have their preferences for good speakers as well as other folks. It usually takes as much talent to interest them in religious truth as other people. The reason is in the constitution of the human mind, and it is in vain to struggle against it, even in pleading the value of truth for its own sake. There must be something to stimulate attention, to exercise and occupy the various faculties of the mind—some variety in matter or arrangement, in the modes of illustration or of expression; an angel himself would not be listened to long on any other terms. Pious, devout men, with a good sense of propriety, may do much good in the world, though defective in other mental powers; but it is very rare that such an one would be acceptable or useful in the Christian ministry. S. D.

COLPORTAGE AMONG THE MEXICANS.—By the latest intelligence from Mexico, the colporteurs of the American Tract Society laboring at Jalapa and Vera Cruz, were still prosecuting their work without molestation. They continue to visit the Mexicans with perfect freedom, selling them books, and receiving from them only friendly treatment. The hospitals, with sick and dying soldiers, share in their attentions. One of them writes from Vera Cruz, under date of June 1st, as follows: 'I have been very sick. God brought me to the mouth of the grave, but thanks to His name, I am still among the living. People are dying here very fast. There is a great work to be done, a work requiring much time and labor. But with God's help, it can be accomplished. Letters from Dr. J. at Jalapa have been received. I think he will be likely to continue in Mexico.' It remains to be seen what effect peace will have upon the continued prosecution of their work, under the Mexican Government.

GERMAN COLPORTEUR.—A German colporteur of the American Tract Society, in Western Pennsylvania, during the three months preceding last April, visited about 1,000 families, and found 341 of them destitute of Bibles. "Many families are convinced of the duplicity of the priests, (he writes,) but fear of them keeps the people in spiritual bondage. They will not long remain in this state, for the fire is kindled, and it will not easily be extinguished. A female Romanist recently told me that she had often contradicted my doctrines, but now she is certain they are from God. Formerly her husband was very violent, and she was always afraid when he came home. Since he has been instructed by me, she said, he was gentle and kind, and the children rejoice at his return. The people have been persecuted by their friends, yet they read their Bibles and religious books, and have family prayer."

THE INDIANS.—The Choctaws and Cherokees may yet form an independent State in our Union. According to the Rev. Mr. Treat's report of his late visit among them—at a monthly missionary meeting in Boston, on Sunday evening—they bid fair to become at least quite as worthy of fellowship as some who now enjoy it. The former are now expending $30,000 annually, from their national funds, on boarding-schools, and their churches number eight hundred members. Nor are the latter much behind in the progress of civilization. They have a well-administered government, orderly churches, two high schools, and other means of social and moral improvement.

---

THE GOSPEL NEEDED IN WISCONSIN.—"In the most destitute part of my field," writes a colporteur in Wisconsin, "I have found a settlement where they have had no religious meeting for three or four years. They are destitute of books, and without the means to pay for them. I visited one settlement of twenty-two families, living in the heavy timber, and found but two who had any books. I supplied each in the name of the Tract Society. The people had no money, and were in want of the necessaries of life. The books were most gratefully received."

---

INTELLIGENCE OF THE FRENCH PEOPLE.—Every thing which has a bearing upon the great experiment in France, has a deep interest. The population of the Republic is estimated at about 34,000,000, of whom 16,800,000 cannot read and write. About 2,430,000 have an ordinary education, and 1,000,000 have gone through with a course of classical studies. Under the new government, there are 8,916,000 voters.

---

SOURCE OF NEW ENGLAND GLORY.—Hon. Horace Mann, Superintendent of Common Schools in Massachusetts, recently stated, that for the last ten years, the average expenditures of the city of Boston, for education, were equal to the whole amount expended by the English Government for the education of seventeen millions of people!

---

THE JESUITS.—The disciples of Ignatius Loyola are getting to be regarded everywhere in Europe with distrust. Spain, Portugal, France, Italy, and Switzerland, will no longer harbor them. Even the very capital of the papal world is obliged to eject them. In all christendom, it seems, America will now be their only asylum.

---

THE STEAMER TROY, which formerly run as a day boat between this city and Troy, was last spring thoroughly overhauled and fitted up to run as a night boat. She is now one of the neatest and quietest boats on the river; and, under the command of Capt. Frazee and his gentlemanly assistant, is receiving, as she deserves, a good share of public patronage. Her regular days of leaving New York are Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, at 6 o'clock P. M.

AT HOME AGAIN.—After an absence of nearly four weeks, we are again seated in the editorial chair. While away from the office, we have had the privilege of attending the meetings of the Central and Western Associations, and of forming many pleasant acquaintances with brethren whom we have heretofore known only by name. At a future day we may have something to say about the progress of our cause in the regions we have visited. At present, however, we have neither time nor space for anything upon the subject.

NEWS FROM OUR MISSIONARIES.—By the ship Joshua Bates, which arrived at New York on sixth-day last, we received letters from our missionary brethren at Shanghai, China, dated February 23, 1848. At that time they were all well, and were prosecuting their labors amid many encouragements. They had attained such a knowledge of the language, as to enable them to converse with the Chinese to some extent about the plan of salvation—an exercise in which they find great satisfaction.

BOSTON SEAMAN'S FRIEND SOCIETY.—The 20th Annual Report of this Association is just published, and contains many statements of facts which are very encouraging. The receipts of the Society during the past year were $3,088 73. There have been paid out $3,149 65, for the expenses of the Society, including the Home, and the amount paid the Parent Society in New York. The Report expresses the want which is felt of a good Library for the Reading Room of the Sailor's Home, and the means of enlarging the boarding-house.

BIBLE-BURNING IN CORK.—A correspondent of the Kerry (Ireland) Evening Post, gives an account of the burning of Bibles by a priest of Newmarket, county of Cork. "Twenty-two Bibles," he says, "were thrown into the flames surrounded by hundreds of rejoicing spectators, who with clubs threw the flaming Bibles into the air, and, as they fell, beat them back into the flames, shouting, 'We will beat and burn the life out of them.' Part of the town appeared illuminated, as if in commemoration of some great national victory. This scene was repeated on the following day."

THE INFLUENCE OF FAMILY PRAYER.—The late Dr. Hyde, of Lee, wrote as follows to one of his sons, on the subject of filial subordination, and the influence of family prayer in promoting it:—

"It was my study to impress on the minds of my children a spirit of subordination, and to be known as the head of the family. I never kept a rod in my house, yet I would have my children obey me. I presume you have no recollection of my ever correcting you, but you were taught to mind me early, before you had numbered two years. In guiding my children, I was greatly aided by the daily return of the morning and evening sacrifice, which you never knew me to omit. In this service you ought to engage, if you mean to have a well-regulated family."

FROM EUROPE.

The Cambria, which arrived at Boston on Friday, brings news to the 17th of June, and as far as France is concerned, the intelligence is of the highest interest.

An attempt has been made to revive the power of the Bonaparte family, in the person of Louis Napoleon, who, under Louis Philippe, attempted to revolutionize France, but was captured and sentenced to imprisonment in the fortress of Ham, whence he escaped to England. On the dethronement of Louis Philippe, although laboring under a decree of banishment, he returned to France, kept himself somewhat concealed, and managed to be elected a member of the Chamber of Deputies. The moment his name was mentioned as returned, it aroused an immense feeling throughout France in favor of a Bonaparte, which the Government found necessary forthwith to put down, or the Republic was lost. The National Assembly exhibited great firmness amidst cries out of doors of "Vive l'Empeuer!" "Vive Bonaparte!" Lamartine, greatly moved, mounted the tribune and demanded the instant passage of a decree confirming the law of 1832 against Louis Napoleon Bonaparte; and while he was speaking, a shot was fired outside the building, and shouts heard of "Vive l'Empeuer!" The motion prevailed; but it is evident that there is a morbid feeling in favor of the Bonapartes. The people say that he shall take his seat; and it is feared there will be trouble unless he is sent out of the country. He has written a very adroit letter of thanks to the people, in which he promises, as usual, every sacrifice for France and democratic institutions.

Italy is doing wonders. In a fight near Rivalta, the Austrian General was defeated, and had to retreat to Mantua. Hungary has resolved not to fight against Italy, and it has been resolved to annex Lombardy to Piedmont. The Pope is willing to fix the iron crown of Charlemagne on the head of Charles Albert, if it will tranquilize Italy, and negotiations are said to be on foot between Austria and Charles Albert.

Every thing in Vienna was quiet. The troubles in Prussia, Denmark, and Naples had not ceased, and Russia was marching armies to the frontiers.

The Chartists, in England, have again been put down by the appearance of a heavy armed force.

There has been no material change in Poland.

General Intelligence.

A Wonderful Phenomenon.—A singular phenomenon was brought to light a short time since, in the township of Greenfield, Mich., about eight miles from Detroit. The Messrs. Grangers, in boring to find water to supply their saw mill, sunk a four inch-hole to the depth of seventy feet, when they struck a vein or cavity. As they withdrew the auger from the hole, to their great surprise, it was followed by a violent current of air, that threw up stones as large as hen's eggs, ten or fifteen feet high. For a few moments, when the hole was first opened, the air was accompanied by a stream of water, which was thrown ten or twelve feet high. The water, however, soon ceased coming, and the air gushed out with such force that the roar could be distinctly heard fifty or sixty rods distant. On touching fire to the air, it caught, and the flames flashed twenty feet high, and came near burning the building, covering the machinery in which it is located. They finally succeeded, with considerable difficulty, in stopping it, by forcing down blankets, and driving a spile into the hole, which was their only means of stopping the air or gas, and extinguishing the flames. For several moments after the hole was stopped, the earth trembled and shook for some distance around, as though an eruption was about to take place. The people, who by this time had gathered to the number of about a hundred, were greatly alarmed at these symptoms, and scattered with all possible rapidity, supposing that Millerism was about coming to a focus, or that they were about to be blown up sky high by an earthquake. From the time it was opened till it was thus closed, was about six hours, and the air gushed out all the time with unabated violence. It has been opened several times since with the same effect. The power and force of the air does not seem to diminish in the least. The Messrs. Grangers are proposing to secure it with apparatus so as to shut it off and let it out at leisure, and test it real qualities. The people in that vicinity are all confident now that it can be conveyed to Detroit in pipes, and successfully used for lighting the streets with gas, from this great natural, underground gasometer. We learn that several scientific gentlemen of this city intend visiting it soon.

The Winnebagoes.—A correspondent of the St. Louis Reville, writing from Fort Atkinson, on the 3d inst., says: We have had a deal of trouble, and very many violent councils with the Indians, on the subject of their removal—the principal objection being fear of the Sioux, So strong was this feeling among them, that some few days since, after the withdrawal of the troops from their councils, they attempted flight in a body toward Missouri. I dispatched Lieut. McKenny and about fifty men after them, just at sundown. They were overhauled about midnight. Lieut. McK. getting between them and sundown, held them in check until some of their fears were allayed, and, sending out a small reinforcement, I had them marched to within three miles of the Fort, where they are now, the whole tribe literally under guard. To-day I shall send the balance of my command down, and after turning over the public property here, will follow this evening myself, and camp among them until the 6th inst., when we will all take up our line of march for the Crow Wing river, latitude 47 degrees north. I shall have with me my whole company and a well-tried six-pounder. The Indians are now satisfied of two things—that there is not so much danger as they apprehended; and that, danger or no danger, they are bound to go. We shall travel two weeks of the time through a fine elk and buffalo country.

The Age of Improvement.—We learn that to the freight train from New York on the Stonington Railroad, there has recently been added a refrigerator car, for the purpose of transporting butter, cheese, oysters, &c., to arrive in Boston between 9 and 10 o'clock, A. M. bringing them in a cool and fresh state. There is also attached to the steamboat train a fruit car, in charge of a special messenger, which arrives at about 4 o'clock A. M. The Journal states that the detention by fog of the steamboats on the Sound has also been obviated on this line by the erection of a light-house, by Government, and the hanging of a large fog bell, by the company, on one of the small islands at the entrance of Stonington Harbor. This bell is rung constantly during thick weather, thus enabling the boats to run by the sound of the bell from the light boat outside, directly into the harbor. The riddance of the ferry boat nuisance at Providence, and this arrangement, by which the boats will not be detained by fog, commends this route to New York, as safe speedy, and expeditious.

The Pine Distemper.—The Mobile Herald says that the disease which is destroying the pine forests of the Carolinas has made its appearance in Baldwin Co. It exhibits some singular phenomena. Occasionally it proceeds in a straight line, destroying not only the full-grown trees, but the small shoots just springing up. Then again it goes into circles, leaving trees in the intermediate spaces sound and vigorous. The trees die just as though they had been girdled. The leaves wither and fall off, and the trunk soon runs to decay. Our informant does not attribute the cause of this strange distemper to worms. The only worm seen about it is the common one peculiar to the pine tree. His impression is, that the cause is entirely an atmospheric one, and that no remedy can be found for it. Vegetables, like animal life, appear to be the subject of epidemics, and doubtless this disease is of that nature. In all probability, it will sweep through the entire pine region of the United States.

We learn by a letter from Washington, that a duel took place on Friday, near Bladensburg, the favorite battle ground of the District. The parties were both Southerners, one named Wiltbank; the other, whose name is not given, is a clerk in the Post Office Department. They were rivals for the affections of a fair one, and some difficulty arising from this cause, led to the rencounter. At the second fire, the challenger received a ball through his arm, and the combat was suspended; not, however, without a prospect of a second meeting some time this week.

Maryland Harvest.—The Kent News of Saturday, published at Chestertown, says: "Our farmers are generally engaged in harvesting. The Mediterranean and other early varieties of Wheat have been secured, and the crop is believed to be a fair average one. The later wheat in corn ground is not as promising as the other. The oat crop will be considerably shortened by the dry spring. Corn stands and looks well, but no opinion can be ventured as to it, for the crisis of a July or August drouth it may have to encounter."

The Centreville Times, Queen Anne's County, of Saturday, says: "Many of our farmers in this neighborhood are in the midst of their harvest. It is conceded that the wheat crop will exceed an average one."

The Williamsport Times, noticing the late rains, says: "Harvesting has, thereby, been somewhat retarded, and should the rains continue for a few more days, it is probable the cut grain would be injured, but the benefit resulting to the corn, and grass crops, which had materially suffered, is yet regarded by far the most advantageous."

'The Old Sarpint.'—A few days since a vessel from the African coast arrived at Salem, Mass., bringing as passenger one of those enormous Boa Constrictors that "we read of," but which never before has been captured by man. It was caught in a heavy rope-net made for the purpose, and while coiled up, this net was thrown over him, and the captain of the vessel solemnly avers that it required the united efforts of 126 negroes for more than seven hours to secure his snakeship! He measures 30 feet in length—and the morning before his arrival 57 eggs were found in his cage, which were deposited in a single night, and the aggregate weight of these snake's eggs is 70 pounds! One of the eggs being broken, was found to contain a young snake seven inches long, which immediately upon emerging from the shell, crawled about the cage with great rapidity. A few days, therefore, will doubtless bring the other 56 young snakes to light. What a nest of serpents!

As soon as the arrival of the vessel and its extraordinary freight was known, several menagerie companies dispatched their agents to Salem, and Barnum also dispatched his manager Hitchcock. Its owner asks $11,000 for it. At the last accounts $7,500 had been offered.

Niagara Suspension Bridge.—Mr. Buchanan, assistant engineer, in the corps engaged upon the iron bridge, gives the following items in regard to that structure, which may be of interest to our readers:—Number of cables for bridge, 16; No. of strands in each cable, 600; ultimate tension, 6,500 tons; capacity of the bridge, 500 tons; No. of strands in the ferry cable, 37; diameter of the cable, 7-8 of an inch; hight of stone tower, 68 feet 1 inch; hight of wood tower for ferry, 50 feet; base of the tower, 20 square feet; size at the top, 11 square feet; span of the bridge, 800 feet; whole weight of the bridge, 650 tons; hight from the water, 230 feet; depth of water under the bridge, 250 feet.

SUMMARY.

Gen. Washington's library—that is, the portion of it sold to Mr. Stevens, of Vermont—has been purchased by a number of citizens of Boston, for presentation to the Athenæum. It contains, in all, about 450 bound volumes, and from 800 to 1,000 pamphlets, unbound, nearly all of which belonged to the library of Washington. About 350 contain his autograph, and a few notes in his hand-writing.

A telegraphic dispatch to the New York Tribune, dated June 29, says that a party of men engaged in raising the frame of a house near Spring Water, Livingston Co., N. Y., when two boys began wrestling, and one, a son of a man engaged in raising the frame, was thrown and killed. The father of the boy, shocked at the death of his son, let go his hold of the frame, and others of the party going to his assistance, the frame fell, killing six persons on the spot.

The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin, says: "I am informed, with what degree of certainty I cannot say, that our Consul at Havana has dispatched a communication to the President, in which he states it is his firm impression, that a general uprising will shortly take place in the Island, on the part of the republican portion of the inhabitants; and that, in numbers, (supplied as they are with arms, &c.,) he thinks there is every probability of success in their plans.

A most atrocious murder was committed near the Long Island Railroad depot on Friday afternoon. About 1 o'clock, two men in the train refused to pay their fare, which led to an altercation between them and the conductor, Mr. Edwin H. Marvin. After a few words, one of the men struck the conductor a blow, which knocked him off the car. He fell under the train, which passed over, and instantly killed him.

A merchant of Boston, of undoubted worth, E. A. Cook, Esq., doing business in Milk street, left the Winthrop House, (where his wife and family reside,) on Tuesday last, with the avowed purpose of going to New York. He is known to have had $12,000 about his person at the time. He cannot be traced to New York, or is anything known of his whereabouts since he left the hotel, as above stated. It is feared that he may have met with some accident.

The length of the Smithsonian Institute is four hundred and fifty feet. Its breadth at the towers is one hundred and fifty feet; its general breadth fifty-four feet. The eastern wing will first be finished and put in order for the reception of the secretary, and for the immediate purposes of the board. When finished it will be a unique and beautiful edifice, worthy of the dignity of antiquity, and of the enlightened liberality of its founder.

The Quebec papers chronicle the death of George Parez, Esq., who died in that place lately at the advanced age of 95. He was born in Germany, Nov. 21, 1752, and emigrated to America when very young, in search of a livelihood. By his industry and intelligence he accumulated the largest fortune in Canada. After the great fire in Quebec, in 1845, he remitted to his numerous tenants in the La Roche suburbs, all their back rents, in some cases five or six years being due.

On Thursday evening, (says the Wilmington N. C. Commercial of the 24th,) at about half past eight o'clock, the store occupied by Mr. C. H. Lippet, situated on Front-st., between Market and Dock, was discovered to be on fire. Mr. L. being absent, it was found expedient to burst through the door, when it was discovered that the entire back of the store was enveloped in flames. The amount of damage done is not exactly known; but it is presumed that the insurance ($7,000 on goods, and $1,000 on the building) would cover the loss.

The Cincinnati Signal says: "The crops seem to satisfy the farmers; so far, the promise is good. In this section every thing looks well, though a little backward. The grass is heavy, and haying is about to begin. Grain looks well. The potatoe is not far enough advanced to show signs of the rot. The fruit trees of all kinds are well filled. Peaches will be abundant. Grapes are promising, and we hope they may this year escape the rot.

There are many cases of poisoning, which are said to be the result of eating food, but which are the result of cooking the food, copper vessels being the primary cause. Copper vessels soon lose their tinning in cooking, and acids are apt to combine with the metal, forming an active poison in the shape of salts in combination with the food cooked in the vessel.

Nine times out of ten a wound will heal quicker if done up in its own blood, than in any other way. As for a burn, whatever will entirely exclude the air the quickest is the best. Cotton will do this. So will oiled silk, if stuck down at the edges by any kind of sticking salve. Put nothing on a burn to heal it. Nature will soon do that, when the air is excluded, and the pain will almost immediately cease.

The crops in West Jersey have been much injured by the army worm, which has in some places entirely stripped the wheat stalks of all their blades. The fly has committed ravages among the crops, which it is feared will not be as large as last year. The army worms are, some of them, double the size of a knitting-needle, and spread in irresistible numbers.

A correspondent of the New York Tribune says that H. H. Slatter, the notorious slave-dealer at Baltimore, has abandoned the traffic and closed finally his slave market. The fugitives from Washington, who were recaptured on board the Pearl, were about the last he had the heart to purchase.

The steamers Martha Washington and Uncle Ben, both bound up, came in collision on the night of the 14th ult., near Rome, about 150 miles below Louisville. The latter had her bow stove in, and her stem broken, and came very near sinking. In a few moments she had shipped about 18 inches water, and it was with the greatest difficulty her officers and crew saved her from destruction.

On Tuesday the fine ship 'Amsterdam Temperance Society,' Capt. Menkman, with a tetotal crew, arrived here, in 53 days from Amsterdam, being the first Dutch Temperance Ship that has crossed the ocean. It was in view of proclaiming aloud the principle of Abstinence for sailors, that this ship was fitted out and manned by Messrs. Jacob Post & Co., of Amsterdam. It was considered a bold innovation, in that city.

We learn from the Concordia Intelligencer of the 17th ult., that three negro women, belonging to B. F. Glassock, of Black River, were struck by lightning during a severe thunder-storm. They had taken refuge under a tree. Two of them were immediately killed, while the third is not expected to survive.

The Trenton Gazette says:—The reports from the different sections of our State, in relation to the growing crops, are of the most satisfactory character. Wheat, corn, oats, potatoes, and grass, are all in an unusually forward state; and the probability is, that the agricultural products of the State will, this year, far exceed in value the harvests of the last, even allowing a difference of 20 per cent. upon the cash value in favor of 1847.

The dead body of a man, apparently about 40 years of age, was found in a ravine, in South Hadley, Mass., on Wednesday, the 21st ult., near a spring, partly covered, and had been more completely covered. A coroner's inquest was held over it the next day, and a verdict of murder rendered. The flesh was decayed, and cleaved from the bones as the turf was removed.

A model of an electric frigate of forty-four guns, full rigged, with guns, men, life-boat, &c., has been exhibited in Buffalo. The model was built by Mr. E. Hurst of Canada—the motive power and apparatus by Dr. Albert Henderson of Buffalo. Electricity is the propelling agent, and her guns are fired, bells rung, &c., by the same instrumentality.

Hunt's Merchant's Magazine gives a list of sixty-five railroad companies in the United States, with their respective length, fare through, and cents per mile, showing "that the railroad companies adopting the lowest rates of fare, pay the largest dividends. An unanswerable argument in favor of low fares."

An unfortunate accident happened near Woodville, Miss., on the 10th inst. A party of gentlemen were about starting out on a hunt, when their dogs commenced fighting. A young lawyer, by the name of Benj. M. Cage, while endeavoring to separate the dogs, using the breach of his gun for that purpose, was shot through the body, by the accidental discharge of the piece, and expired almost instantly.

The steamer Empire, while coming into port at Kingston, (Canada,) on Friday last, was careened over by the wind, and sunk immediately in 12 feet water. The passengers had barely time to escape, without saving their property, and after the steamer had sunk an aged man and woman were rescued by cutting through the deck.

We learn from the Taunton (Mass.) Daily Gazette, that two young men, named John and Francis Leonard, were on Monday detected in an attempt to break open the vault of the Taunton Bank. Both were arrested, and considerable stolen property was found in their possession. They are the sons of a respectable widow lady, who is thrown into the deepest distress by their criminal conduct.

A great meeting was held at Montreal last week, in favor of the repeal by the British Parliament of the existing Navigation Laws. Resolutions were also adopted urging the abrogation, so far as concerns the colony of Canada, of the restrictive policy of the British Navigation Laws, and the removal of every obstruction to the free navigation of the St. Lawrence, by foreign vessels.

Mr. Levet, dentist, has invented an enamel for covering the fastening of artificial teeth, in imitation of the gums. It only needs to have its durability tested by actual use in order to demonstrate its value.

The Richmond Whig says, "The wheat harvest was commenced last week in this and the neighboring counties, and it promises an extensive crop. The country presents a beautiful and most refreshing appearance.

The people of Newport, R. I., have voted against licenses. This will compel the fashionables, who go there for the summer, to be strictly temperate, unless some mode of evading the law can be invented by the shrewd Yankees of the place.

The above Periodicals are reprinted in New York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals, Blackwood's Magazine being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

They embrace the views of the three great parties in England—Tory, Whig, and Radical. "Blackwood" and the "London Quarterly" are Tory; the "Edinburgh Review" Whig; and the "Westminster Review" Radical. The "North British Review" is more of a religious character, having been originally edited by Dr Chalmers, and now, since his death, being conducted by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, associated with Sir David Brewster. Its literary character is of the very highest order.

SONG OF THE STARS.

BY W. C. BRYANT.

When the radiant morn of creation broke,
And the world, in the smile of God, awoke,
And the empty realms of darkness and death
Were moved thro' their depths by his mighty breath,
And orbs of beauty, and spheres of flame
From the void abyss of myriads, came,
In joy of their youth, as they darted away
Through the widening waste of space to play,
Their voices in silver chorus rung;
And this is the song that the bright ones sung.

"Away, away, through the wide, wide sky;
The fair blue fields that before us lie;
Each seen, with the worlds that around us roll,
Each planet, poised on her turning pole,
With her eyes of green and her clouds of white,
And her waters that lie like fluid light.

"For the source of glory uncovered his face,
And the brightness o'erflows unbounded space;
And we drink, as we get the luminous tides,
In our ruddy air and our blooming sides.
Lo! yonder the living splendors play;
Away—on our joyous path—away.

"Look, look through our glittering ranks afar,
In the glittering azure, star after star;
How they brighten and bloom as they swiftly pass!
How the verdure runs o'er each rolling mass;
And the path of the gentle winds is seen
Where the small waves dance, and the young woods [lean.

"And see where the brighter day-beams pour,
How the rainbow hangs in the sunny shower,
And the morn and eve, with their pomp of hues,
Shift o'er the bright planets and shed their dews;
And betwixt them both, or the teeming ground,
With her shadowy cone, the night goes round.

"Away, away in our blossoming bowers,
In the soft air wrapped these spheres of ours;
In these seas and fountains that shine with morn,
See, love is brooding, and life is born,
And breathing myriads are breathing from night
To rejoice like us, in motion and light.

"Glide on in your beauty, ye youthful spheres,
To weave the dance that measures the years,—
Glide on, in glory and gladness sent,
To the furtherest wall of the firmament,—
The boundless, visible smile of Him,
To the veil of whose brow, your lamps are dim."

ITALY.

Italy, as a nation, exists only in name, having been long broken up into a number of States, none of which remain independent, while others have become connected with Austria. The principal of these States are—the kingdom of Naples, the present king of which is Ferdinand II.; Sicily, just separated from Naples, which is about to call a Bourbon prince to the new throne; the Roman States of the Church, ruled by the Pope; the Grand Duchy of Tuscany, held by Austria; the kingdom of Sardinia, the dominion of the fierce Charles Albert; and the kingdom of Lombardy and Venice, subject to Austria. These divisions are further so divided in feeling, by the local patriotism of the Italians, which seems incapable of embracing within its attachment any thing beyond a city or a precinct, and is jealous of all without, that but for the strong pressure of their governments against this tendency, each community would at once become a miniature nation. These States are, indeed, sometimes brought to act together, for the attainment of a common end, as in the present alliance against Austria, but the unyielding desire of each to be in the lead of any such movement, has always hitherto sufficed to prevent any material results from the union.

The population of Italy is about 25,000,000. They are an excitable but enervated people, and may be described as the Persians of Europe. The Republics of Rome, Venice, and Genoa, which fill so large a space in the world's history, attest the energy and intelligence that once prevailed in Italy; but powerful causes, that have worked steadily for ages, have changed the character of the people, and made them wholly unfit for popular government, such at least, as it is in our day.

The present condition of Italy is in some degree owing to repeated conquests, but more to the misrule of its own governments. The ravages of the Goth and Vandals was a lighter evil than the tyranny of the Popes. The last French conquest, indeed, was a positive blessing to the country, and the good-will they have lately manifested towards the Italians, and far more, as a return for restoring the Pope to the throne from which Napoleon had driven him. From that period, no country has been more wretchedly misgoverned. Despotism in its worst form was established in all the States. In the immediate dominion of the Popes, every thing tending to advance the condition of the people, was carefully excluded. Railroads were not only forbidden, but communication actually obstructed, and not an agricultural or commercial association, a bank, or any institution allowed to exist, that could aggravate such an evil as the public convenience. Under this efficient cultivation, Italy speedily become a hot-bed of ignorance, poverty, misery, and disorder. The poor people made an occasional outbreak, (so feeble, indeed, as to show their moral state the most pitiable,) but the Austrian government was prompt in the neighborly office of suppressing all such riotous movements, which, however it regarded without disfavor, as the means of carrying its own boundary down the peninsula. When, at last, the course of the Italian sovereigns shocked the democratic sensibilities of ven Austria, and the patriot exiles of Italy were protected in Vienna, mercenaries were imported from Switzerland—a country always ready to fight for its own liberties, always ready to enslave other people.

In 1846, in the midst of these abuses, Cardinal Mastai-Feretti became Pope Pius IX. The soul of Gregory XVI., was not in him, and the world in amazement saw in the Pontiff a practical advocate of liberal doctrines. He took the new road of Reform, and in spite of the threats of Austria, the warning finger of the now dethroned, and the deadly enmity of a faction at home, whose attempts against his life made it necessary for him to oversee even the preparation of his food, and be his own menial, while his public cares demanded incessant attention—has effected salutary changes. He sent home the Swiss mercenaries—gave the native soldiers their proper station, provided them with good bread—gave the lower classes access to him—pardoned all exiles for political offences, restoring several thousand of these unfortune people to their homes—reformed the municipal codes—suppressed vagrancy—meliorated the condition of the Roman Jews—and encouraged education, commerce, agriculture, and general industry. To be sure, the intention is more important as yet than the act of the Pope, so far as actual results are concerned; but he has entered the wedge, and there can be no turn—the movement must go forward till it ends in better or worse for Italy.

It is probable that the Pope is blind to the full consequences of the movement he has started forward Does he mean to roll away the foundations of that gorgeous Babel, on the top of which his own chair is placed as the connecting link between heaven and earth? He would not have climbed there to seek such a fall. The truth appears that he is but a half enlightened reformer—he is not unlike to Italy what Peter was to Russia. He has not learned that Ignorance is the mother of Superstition—that Truth is not insolated, but always leagued with Truth—and when he does awake, at last, we shall probably see him in an impotent effort to extinguish the fire which he has himself kindled, and in which the mysteries which have upheld Papacy for long ages, are dissolving like iron which has stood the shock of force, but melts in the furnace. [Newburyport Herald.

THE CAMEL.

There is no difference between a camel and dromedary, except that the latter is lighter, more supple and active, and commonly younger, qualities which render him more fit for riding; while the heavy, stiff, hard-placed animal is, on these accounts, devoted to carrying burden.

Camels are formed for the desert, to which they are admirably adapted, and for which God evidently designed them. They eat less than any other animal, and do well upon such food as could not sustain life in any other form. They are indifferent to water, even when they have traveled several days under a burning sun without any. Their broad, spreading foot sustains them upon plains of deep, yielding sand, and it holds to the smooth, steep rocks with the greatest tenacity. I never knew one to stumble or fall except in a single instance. The Bedouins appear to understand that the camel, no less than themselves, is fit only for the desert, and they can seldom be induced to advance even for a few miles, into an agricultural region. We tried to induce our guides to proceed with us to Jerusalem, as we found that it would be difficult to obtain horses for such a large party at Hebron. They declined it, however, though we offered high pay, alledging a variety of reasons, but influenced evidently by their reluctance to come in contact with improved life. They have an evident aversion to walled towns and permanent stone habitations, and are only happy in the unrestrained freedom of the desert.

The camel is much used about commercial places for transporting heavy articles; and he loses, under these circumstances, many of his peculiar habits and characteristics. He attains to double his usual size and strength, is more fat and clumsy, consumes large quantities of hay and grain, and drinks with nearly the same frequency and copiousness as other beasts of burden. [Olin's Travels.

THE PRINTER.

A printer is the most curious being living. He may have a BANK and COINS and not be worth a penny—have SMALL CAPS, and neither wife nor children. Others may run fast, but he gets along swiftest by SETTING fast. He may be making IMPRESSIONS without eloquence; may use the LYE without offending, and be telling truth; while others cannot stand when they set, he can SET standing, and even do both at the same time—may make use of FURNITURE, and yet have no dwelling—may make and put away PI, and "never see a pie," much less eat it during his life—be a human being and a RAT at the same time—may PRESS a great deal and not ask a favor—may handle a SHOOTING IRON, and know nothing about a cannon, gun, or pistol—he may move the LEVER that moves the world, and be as far from moving the globe as a hog with his nose under a mole hill—spread SHEETS without being a housewife—he may lay his FORM on his BED and yet be obliged to sleep on the floor; he may use the † without shedding blood, and from the earth may handle the ; he may be of a ROLLING disposition, and yet never desire to travel; he may have a SHEEP'S FOOT, and not be deformed; never be without a CASE, and know nothing of law or physic; be always CORRECTING his ERRORS and yet growing worse every day; have em〰s without ever having the arm of a lass around him; have his FORM locked up, and at the same time be free from jail, watch-house, or any other confinement.

A Singular Plant.—A communication has been recently made to the London Linæan Society, covering a letter from the northern part of India, giving an account of a plant found there, which, when chewed, actually destroys the power of the tongue to appreciate the taste of sugar. It is the gymnema sylvestre; nat. ord. asclepideæ, and goes by the name of Indian plant. Two hours after chewing some of the leaves, the aroma of tea could be appreciated, but the sugar with which it was sweetened could not be detected. The impression remains about twenty-four hours, sugar all the while feeling like sand on the tongue. It is suggested that this may lead to some important physiological discoveries in regard to the organ of taste.

The Boy makes the Man.—A man's character is formed early in life. There may be some exceptions. In some instances, very great changes take place after a person has grown to manhood. But, even in such cases, many of the early habits of thought, feeling, and action still remain. And sometimes we are disappointed in the favorable appearances of early life. Not unfrequently the promising boy, in youth or early manhood, runs a rapid race downward in the road to ruin. All the promising appearances failed, because they were not formed upon religious principle and a change of heart. But, as a general rule, show me the boy and I will show you the man. [Anecdotes for Boys.

Daily Press of London and Paris.—One of tke proprietors of the Baltimore Sun, who has been in Europe, says, of the London Dailies, only two have a large circulation—the Times, which issues 29,000 copies, and the Daily News, 16,000 per day. In Paris, there are eighteen Dailies. La Presse prints 33,000 copies daily; Le Siecle, 30,000; Le Constitutionnel, 28,000; Journal des Debats, 10,000. Price of La Presse, per year, $8 25, Le Siecle $7 50, Le Constitutionnel $9 75, Journal des Debats $15, Le Moniteur Universal $21. The subscription price of the London Times, he says, is between $31 and $32.

LOUIS PHILIPPE.

A letter from a French lady, admitted to an interview with the ex-royal family of Claremont, says:—

"I cannot tell you how greatly I was shocked when this aged man entered through a glass door, shivering and complaining of the cold—and I recognized the features our King Louis Philippe. His face is much bloated, and he is older by ten years than when I saw him in January last. He knew me, however, on the instant and endeavored to join the conversation, but soon sunk into a fanteuil by the fire and seemed presently to be absorbed in deep thought. The Queen was cheerful enough—almost gay. Her excessive devotion has created a degree of fatalism in her mind like that of the Orientals. She beholds everything that has happened as the will of God, and complains not. It is believed that she even regards it as an expiation, and accepts it in a chastened spirit accordingly. I will not tell you the general impression which prevails in the royal household with regard to the King, but it is such as to make one regret that he met not his death on the threshold of the Tuileries, so that his body might not thus have outlived his mind. I was ushered into a drawing-room on the ground floor, (says the writer,) wherein were seated the Queen and the Duchess de Nemours. Her Majesty was occupied in writing, while the fair young Duchess was engaged upon some kind of needlework, which, from its bulk and homely appearance, certainly did not present any of the peculiarities of lady's fancy work."

ANCIENT BUILDINGS.

Ninevah was 15 miles by 9, and 40 round, with walls 100 feet high, and think enough for three chariots.

Babylon was 70 miles within the walls, which were 75 feet thick, and 300 high, with 100 brazen gates.

The temple of Diana at Ephesus was 425 feet long, and 200 broad, with 127 columns, 60 feet high to support the roof. It was 200 years in building.

The largest of the pyramids is 481 feet high, and 693 feet on the sides; its base covered 11 acres. The stones are about 30 feet in length, and the layers are 208; 360,000 men were employed in its erection.

The labyrinth of Egypt contained 3,000 chambers, and 12 halls.

Thebes, in Egypt, present ruins 27 miles round. It has 100 gates.

Carthage was 25 miles round.

Athens was 25 miles round, and contained 25,000 citizens, and 400,000 slaves.

The temple of Delphos, was so rich in donations, that it was once plundered of 19,000 sterling, and Nero carried from it 500 statues.

The walls of Rome were 13 miles.

ODDITIES OF GREAT MEN.

The greatest men are often affected by the most trivial circumstances, which have no apparent connection with the effects they produce. An old gentleman felt secure against the cramp when he placed his shoes, on going to bed, so that the right shoe was on the left of the left shoe, and the toe of the right next to heel of the left. If he did not bring the right shoe round the other side that way, he was liable to the cramp. Dr. Johnson put one foot upon each stone of the pavement; if he failed he felt certain that the day would be unlucky. Buffon, the celebrated naturalist, never wrote but in full dress. Dr. Routh, of Oxford, studied in full canonicals. An eminent writer can never compose without his slippers on. A celebrated preacher of the last century, could never make a sermon with his gaiters on. A great German scholar writes with his braces off. Reiseg, the German critic, wrote his commentaries on Sophocles with a [illegible] of porter by his side. Schlegel lectured, at the age of twenty-two, extempore in latin, with his snuff-box in his hand; without it he could not go on.

ALLEGORICAL.

A traveler, setting out on a long journey, was assailed on the road by curs, mastiffs, and half-grown puppies, which came out from their kennels to bark at him as he passed along. He often dismounted from his horse, to drive them back with stones and sticks, into their hiding places. This operation was repeated every day, and sometimes as often as twenty times a-day. The consequence was that more than half the traveler's time was consumed in chasing those dogs and puppies. At last he was overtaken by a neighbor who was going the same road, but who had set out a long time after him. The latter traveler was very much surprised to find the other no farther on his journey; and, on hearing the reason, "Alas!" said he, "is it possible that you have lost your time and wasted your strength in this idle occupation? These animals have beset me all along the road, but I have saved my time and my labor by taking no notice of their barkings, whilst you have lost yours in resenting insults which did you no harm, and in chastising dogs and puppies, whose manners you can never mend."

An Eccentric.—The Rev. Wm. Smith, of Weymouth, Mass., entertaining notions somewhat singular of subjects becoming the pulpit, was in the habit of preaching occasional sermons on the Sunday after the marriage of his children.

When Mary, his eldest daughter, was married to Richard Cranch, a match which he highly approved, his text was, "Mary hath chosen hat part which cannot be taken from her."

With the marriage of Abigail to John Adams, afterwards President, he was not so much pleased; as he imbibed much of the prejudices of the times against country lawyers. His text at this marriage was, "John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say he hath a devil."

The third daughter, Elizabeth, was married to the Rev. John Shaw, of Haverhill. This was connection which the father greatly approved, which led him to preach from the following text: "There was a man sent from God whose name was John."

A rich man's son frequently begins the world where his father left off, and ends where his father began—penniless. Give your son a trade, and let him be of some service to the world he lives in. Train him up to some honorable business, and in due time he will doubly repay for the labor and the pains bestowed on his youth.

VARIETY.

'Willy,' said a doting parent at the breakfast table, to an abridged edition of himself, who had had just entered the grammar class at the High School; 'Willy, my dear, will you pass the butter?' 'Thertainly, thir,—I can parthe anything. Butter ith a common thubthantive, neuter gender, agreeith with hot buckwheat cakthe, and ith governed by thugar-houth molatheth understhtood.'

We understand, says the Springfield Republican, that a machine has been recently invented in this town for folding newspapers and other printed matter. It is to be connected with a cylinder or improved Adams press, so that the sheets come forth from the press folded in the required form. The inventor warrants to fold 3,600 papers per hour of any size with the greatest accuracy.

There is a place on earth, to which vice has no entrance; where the gloomy passions have no empire; where pleasure and innocence live constantly together; where cares and labors are delightful; where every pain is forgotten in reciprocal tenderness; where there is an equal enjoyment of the past, the present, and the future. It is the house, too, of a wedded pair; but a pair who in wedlock are lovers still.

A mechanic at the mills on the Ramapo river has invented a machine for making brooms which threatens to exterminate broom corn. It takes a billet of white ash, and in a trice cuts it fine like the Manilla grass used for brushes. The brooms can be made for two cent each, and they are said to work quite as well in every respect as corn brooms, and to be much more enduring.

The Newark Advertiser states that Dr. Cotton is exhibiting in that city a curious invention—a Circular Railroad with an engine and car driven by electricity is applied only to the track, and herein consists the peculiarity of the invention. No power is applied directly to the engine and car, and yet they move off with wonderful rapidity upon an electrified track.

In Woodstock, Vermont, Susan D. Whitcomb has obtained a verdict for $439 50 against Rev. John Wolcott for breach of promise. There was an interruption of 15 years in the reign of their love! One witness testified that "Susan sot on the defendant's knee, in which fact he observed nothing criminal or abu-sive, if he understood the natur of roots aud arbs."

Those having the dysentery or bowel complaint, will find an almost unfailing remedy, by procuring a small piece of the root of genuine Turkey rhubarb, and chew a piece about the size of a cherry pit, once or twice through the day. If the genuine article is procured, the remedy is said to be almost sure, in whatever stage the disease may be.

Captain Judkins, of the steamship America, on leaving Liverpool for the United States, on the 15th of April, ordered his dinner to be ready at his hotel, on his return from America, at six o'clock on the 22d ult., and was there within five minutes of the time. In like manner, we understand, he has ordered his dinner to be ready on his next return, on Saturday the 8th of July.

The garden of the Empress of Russia on the island of Yelaguine has conservatories of glass which are upwards of two thousand feet in length. Eighteen columns support the roof; it is nearly eighty feet high, and upward of one hundred in width.

A lady, residing at Edinburgh, has invented a new kind of architectural cement, to which she she given the name of "intonaco," and which is said to be far superior to any stucco or cement hitherto known.

The Scotsman states that the body of the queen of James II., after four centuries of interment, has been exhumed by excavations for demolishing Trinity Church, and building a railway station.

The present military force in Ireland consists of 33,000 men, besides the staffs of the disembodied militia corps, and the recruiting parties, the embodied out-pensioners and armed police.

Men will part with their most pleasant things to save their temporal lives; yet they lose their souls, and incur everlasting misery rather than bestow any labor, or give up any pleasure or interest to prevent it.

Fight hard against a hasty temper. Anger will come, but resist it strongly. A spark may set a house on fire. A fit of passion may give you cause to mourn all the days of your life. Never revenge an injury.

The Boulogne Gazette says: "A Spanish cannon of large calibre has just been found in the port of Calais bearing date A. D. 1567, and the name of Philip II. It is in perfect preservation, very long, and weighs from 14 to 16 cwt.

The proportion of phosphorous in the brain of persons of sound intellect, is from 2 to 2.5 per cent. In the brain of maniacs it is from 3 to 4.5 and in the brain of idiots only from 1 to 1.5 per cent.

A great mind may change its objects, but it cannot relinquish them; it must have something to pursue; variety is its relaxation, and amusement its repose.

The figures upon the magic porcelain of the Chinese, are executed in such a manner that they are invisible when the vessels are empty, but become apparent when they are filled with water.

Among the medical students to whom the London College of Surgeons has lately granted a diploma, is a Hindoo gentleman of the name of Soorjoocomar Goodeve Chuckerbutty.

A man lately died in Ireland of whom the Dublin Packet remarks:—He was a highly respectable gentleman, of good fortune, but by no means remarkable for his observance of law or good morals.

Troubles are like hornets—the less ado you make about them the better, for your outcry will only bring out the whole swarm upon you.

"Remember," said a trading quaker to his son, "in making thy way in the world, a spoonful of oil will go farther than a quart of vinegar."

The best way for a man to overcome evil, is by doing good. No grief arises from reflecting upon good actions.

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth anothet Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

A WESTERN INCIDENT.

At the close of a long day's ride on horseback, from Adams to McDonald County, in the State of Illinois, I found myself alone, in front of a new fenced farm and log cabin. It was early in May, 1839—and I had been riding through oak openings and across prairies, with only an occasional small settlement, till the bright sun was about to retire behind the western forest. Wild flowers, birds innumerable, an occasional deer, and herds of domestic animals—had successively divided my attention with the splendid agricultural prospects of the busy farmer, here and there seen, with his whole family, in the field, planting their luxuriant soil. I was looking for "my lot of land,"—and I had been directed to the occupant of this very farm I was abreast of, for information of its whereabouts. It had been my purpose to reach its neighborhood that night—but I could go no further without additional directions. I rode up to the door of the cabin, and was met by a tall, grave, benignant looking man, who came out from his house uncovered, to meet and greet a stranger. His face was full of thought. Time, toil, and care, had set their mark upon him—but he looked like an Abraham. He saluted and spoke to me, as if I had been a long-absent friend. I explained the object of my call, and inquired the distance to a certain mill, believed by previous informants to occupy a quarter section near to my own land. He replied to my inquiries with much exactness, but indicated a desire for further conversation.

"May I ask, sir, where you are from?"

"From Vermont, sir," I replied.

"From Vermont? Indeed! that is my native State. What town do you live in, sir?"

"Sp——d," said I.

"Sp——d? why, I used to live in Sp——d; when did you live in that town?"

Giving him my name, I explained to him that I had recently removed thither, from Massachusetts; and that I occupied a little place I had purchased of S—— C——, near the center of the village.

"Why, I studied law in that house, with Judge C——," replied he. "Come, you must n't go any further to-night—Mrs. H. must see you. Let the boys have your horse, and spend the night with us. I will go with you in the morning and help you find your land."

I dismounted, a fine lad took my horse—and I was ushered into the cabin with an introduction, by name, to Mrs H., and all the inmates. Such a scene—such a change—thus unexpectedly to be all at once in the midst of an educated New England family—and claimed, too, as a townsman! Mrs. H. and several bright, mannerly children, my respected host, and one other, a quiet looking backwoodsman, were seen together, seated beside the fire, which, though it was not cold, only a little damp and chilly, had been kindled up to prepare the family meal. Question followed question—the table was soon set—a rich feast prepared—and I would n't have exchanged the enjoyment of that evening for all the empty honors and heartless pageantry of any courtly mansion in Christendom.

Saturday had passed, and I had realized in my host all the kindness which our first interview had promised. He had accompanied me through the explorations of the day, and shown me one of the richest tracts of country that human eye ever looked upon.

Sunday morning opened upon this happy family, enrobed with resplendent beauty, which they only can conceive, who have slept amid the vernal odors of an American Prairie. I had learned their story—from the period that my host was an unmarried student at law in Vermont, till I now sat among his children, in the presence of his happy spouse. He had preferred the profession of an EDUCATOR to that of a Litigator. Events had made him the owner of the land on which he and his family now resided, years before he had seen it. When, after many toilsome years, and a tedious horse and wagon journey, he had arrived at this chosen land, he had found the man whom I had met by his hearth, on my first arrival, a squatter on his land. A small cabin and seven enclosed acres constituted this poor man's homestead, and it was but natural that he and his should feel alarmed at the arrival of the stranger who owned it. But no! "He was not to be injured."

"What do you ask for your 'claim,'" said the owner of the patent, "to this 160 acre tract of timber and prairie?"

"Thirty dollars," was the meek reply.

"I'll give it to you," replied my friend, "and you must build yourself another cabin down yonder, and help me put up an addition to this; and then I shall hire you to work for me and help me to make and fence in my farm."

All this had been done; and a newly settled community had gathered from the cabins of a three mile prairie, to welcome the generous Yankee to his new and delightful home, by assisting him and his poor neighbor in erecting their new dwelling. Another enterprise was now to be proposed.

"I am a schoolmaster," said my friend, "and I am going to build a school house. This must also be our church; and I want you all to come and help me what you can; and then you must all send your children, along with mine, to our new school. I will take anything you have to spare, in payment for their tuition. We will also have a Sunday school, and you must all come and bring your children. When we can get anybody to preach to us, we will hear him; and when we have no minister, we will carry on the meeting, by God's blessing, ourselves."

I had already visited this great hewn-log school house, which was situated in a grove, but a few rods off; and now the hour was come for us to go into the Sunday school. What a sight was here! Within, its walls were hung with maps—its shelves piled up with books, and in one corner lay a heap of shucked corn. From the doorway we saw the people coming from every side of the prairie; on foot; on horseback; single; by couples, and in groups; young men, and maidens, and children, and aged pioneers, of all faiths, common to southern Protestantism, coming to unite in the study of the Bible, and the worship of the living God. Never passed I a holier day. Never loved I more my fellow man. Rude and rough though the building, plain and rustic the costume, devotion dwelt there. After prayer and singing, in which the New England pilgrim led the way, all were resolved into Bible classes, till, at the appointed hour of eleven, an aged minister, who had arrived, closed the exercises with a sermon and the appropriate benediction. This good Vermont schoolmaster was become the patriarch of this settlement. Be not surprised, then, when I tell you, that I never knew a more heaven-favored man. He, his accomplished consort, and his dear children, with several more since added to their number, are all now alive and well.

I have not been able to visit that settlement since. But I rejoice, now and then, to receive a letter from this venerable Christian Republican. He laid off some of the land around his school house into lots for new comers; and to such as were of useful trades, and peaceable character, these could be had at their own price. The prairie, I learn, is covered with farms; a Christian church has been organized; a post office established; a town has grown up. The beautiful little girl has become, with her now man-grown brothers, among the most intelligent and accomplished young people in Illinois. Temperance, patriotism, order, thrift, and prosperity, render that settlement, and others in its vicinity, desirable to the law-and-order-loving emigrant, and the way-worn traveler. And, my dear reader, it is because I know that there are such families and communities in the West, who have no part nor lot in the newspaper-trumpeted outbreaks, and lynch-law brawls of Mormons, nor anti-Mormons, "Regulators," "Flatheads," that I narrate this incident. He who travels only on the great roads, or fashionable thoroughfares, stopping alone at hotels and public places, forms but little acquaintance with the bone and sinew of society in our Western States and Territories. We see, too, what education—a single public spirited, energetic, educated individual or family can do for a settlement. Such are the men and women who are needed at the great West. Such will be the results of your schoolmasters' efforts against ignorance. [Practical Educator.

THE INTENDED SUICIDE'S HYMN.

A gentleman was known by his nearest and dearest friend, his wife, never to lie down upon his pillow some years before his death, or raise his head from it in the morning, without repeating the short hymn annexed to this anecdote; and sometimes he would inadvertently burst into ejaculations in company, when two or three lines of it were distinctly heard before he could recollect himself; the cause at that time was unknown; but, after his decease, a paper was found in his bureau to the following purport: "You will no longer be surprised at my involuntary effusions of feeble gratitude to the Almighty, which broke forth occasionally in gay company, when you shall read, that many years since, the dread of approaching poverty, disgrace, humiliation, and desertion of friends, had brought me to the fatal resolution of putting an end to my existence. Conscious that I had brought misfortune upon a numerous family by my own imprudence, dissipation, and pride, I considered my punishment as an act of justice. The destined moment arrived; already had I loaded, primed, and cocked; when, strange to relate! though I had not read a page in the Bible for years, a reflection came suddenly across my mind; 'Jesus of Nazareth,' said I to myself, 'was a man (for I disbelieved in his divinity) acquainted with sorrows, endured a life of poverty, was exposed to public scorn and derision, suffered pain of body and agony of mind, and had nothing to reproach himself with, yet this reformer of the morals of mankind, this benefactor to society, this illustrious pattern of fortitude, patience, and humility, was, by an unthankful world, put to death; he was crucified! but he crucified not himself!' Repeating these last words a second time, with unusual energy, pride, disdain, shame, and contempt of my inability humbly to imitate this striking example of bearing afflictions manfully, produced a passionate conflict of mind, in which paroxysm I madly flung the pistol some distance from me; to add to the affecting scene, it went off, unheard but by my affectionate wife, who religiously kept the secret; her consolations restored me to temporary tranquillity, but the work of Providence was not yet completed; not a week had elapsed, and settled melancholy was again taking possession of my soul, when a letter announced the death of a distant relation, and summoned me to the reading of his will, by which he had bequeathed me sufficient not only to clear me of all encumbrances, but to enable me, with the assistance of a considerable surplus, to exert my abilities in the line of my profession for the support of my family, and even to aim at a moderate independence, which you will find I have at length acquired."

"Rise, oh my soul! the hour review,
  When, awed by guilt and fear,
Thou durst not Heaven for mercy sue,
  Nor hope for pity here!

Dried are thy tears, thy griefs are fled,
  Dispell'd each bitter care;
For Heaven itself did send its aid,
  To snatch thee from despair!

Then here, oh God, thy work fulfil;
  And from thy mercy's throne
Vouchsafe me strength to do thy will,
  And to resist my own.

So shall my soul each power employ
  Thy mercies to adore,
While Heaven itself proclaims with joy
  One rescued sinner more!"

THE FUTURE.

BY FLORENCE GREENVILLE.

The future—the future—what bright hopes and fears
Will burst on our pathway through long-coming years!
Brief moments of gladness, and dark hours of care,
Are hid in the future—'tis wise that they are.

Disturb not the calm of its mist-covered bowers—
Life's pathway is seldom without its sweet flowers;
Some sunbeam of Love gilds the loneliest way,
And Hope's songs of to-morrow, oft gladden to-day.

Sad Memory broods o'er the grave of the Past,
And the skies of the Present are often o'ercast,
But the realms of the Future are sunny and bright,
For Hope and Love dwell in its shadowy light.

'T is well that we know not the sorrow and care
It may be our lot in the future to bear:
Fond hearts may be broken, that thrilled with delight,
Life's sun may rise cloudless, and set in deep night.

Mourn not for what earth's mystic Future may be,
Thy bark speedeth on to eternity's sea:
If thy pathway is darkened, a promise is given
To the pure, of a bright, blessed Future in heaven!

MY MOTHER'S LAST KISS.

I was but five years old when my mother died, but her image is as fresh in my mind, now that many years have elapsed, as it was at the time of her death. I remember her as a pale gentle being, with a sweet smile, and a voice soft and cheerful when she praised me and when I erred—for I was a wild, thoughtless child—there was a trembling mildness about it, that always went to my little heart. Methinks I can now see her large blue eyes, moist with sorrow, because of my waywardness, and hear her repeat, 'My child, how can you grieve me so?'

She had for a long time been pale and feeble, and sometimes there would come a bright spot on her cheek, which made her look so lovely, I thought she would be well. But when she spoke of dying, and pressed me to her bosom, and told me to be good when she was gone, and to love my father a great deal, for he would have no one else to love.

I recollect she was ill all day, and my little hobby-horse and whip were laid aside, and I tried to be very quiet. I did not see her for a whole day, and it seemed very long. At night they told me my mother was too sick to kiss me as she always used to do before I went to bed, and I must go without it. But I could not. I stole into the room, and laying my lips close to hers, whispered—

'Mother, dear mother, won't you kiss me?' Her lips were very cold, and when she put her hand upon my cheek, and laid my head in her bosom, I felt a cold shuddering pass through me.

My father carried me from the room; but he could not speak. After they put me in bed, I lay a long while; I feared my mother would indeed die, for her cheek felt as cold as my little sister's did, when she died, and they carried her sweet little body away where I never saw it again. But I soon fell asleep, as children will.

In the morning I rushed to my mother's room with a strange dread of evil to come upon me. It was just as I feared. There was a white linen, over the straight, cold bed. I tore it aside.

There was a hard cheek, the closed eye, the stony brow. But, thank God, my mother's dear, dear smile was there also, or my heart would have been broken.

In an instant all the little faults for which she had so often reproved me, rushed upon my mind. I longed to tell her how, in all time to come, her words would be law to me. I would be all she had prayed me to be.

I was a passionate, headstrong boy; but never did this frame of temper come upon me but I seemed to see her mild, tearful eyes fall upon me just as she used to look in life, and when I strove for the mastery, I felt her smile sink into my heart, and I was happy.

My whole character underwent a change, even from the moment of her death. Her spirit was forever with me, to aid the good and root out the evil that was within me. I felt it would grieve her gentle spirit to see me err, and I could not do so. I was a child of her affection; I knew she had prayed and wept over me, and that even on the threshold of the grave, her anxiety for my fate had caused her spirit to linger, that she might pray once more for me.

I never forgot my mother's last kiss. It was with me in sorrow; it was with me in joy; it was with me in the moments of evil, like a perpetual good.

The above is a part of a letter of an old man, who had seen his children and his grand-children about him, and who is a cheerful man, with his gray hairs full of reverence.

WHITEFIELD'S BROTHER CONVERTED.

Mr. Whitefield, brother of the noted preacher, had fallen into a backslidden state; but under a sermon preached by his brother in the Countess of Huntingdon's chapel, Bath, it pleased God to arouse him from that state; after which, however, he became melancholy and despairing. He was taking tea with the Countess of Huntingdon, on a service evening, in the chapel house, and her ladyship endeavored to raise his desponding hopes by conversing on God's infinite mercy through Jesus Christ; but, for a while, in vain. "My lady," he replied, "I know what you say is true. The mercy of God is infinite; I see it clearly. But, ah! my lady, there is no mercy for me—I am a wretch, entirely lost." "I am glad to hear it, Mr. Whitefield," said Lady H. "I am glad at my heart that you are a lost man." He looked with great surprise. "What, my lady, glad! glad at your heart that I am a lost man?" "Yes, Mr. Whitefield, truly glad; for Jesus Christ came into the world to save the lost!" He laid down his cup of tea on the table. "Blessed be God for that," said he, "Glory to God for that word," he exclaimed. "Oh what unusual power is this which I feel attending it! Jesus Christ came to save the lost! then I have a ray of hope," and so he went on. As he finished his last cup of tea, his hand trembled, and he complained of illness. He went out into the chapel court for the benefit of the air, but staggered to the wall, exclaiming, "I am very ill." A poor old woman, who was going into the chapel, lent him her staff to support him into the house, saying she would call for it when divine service was over, and inquire after him. But his time was come. Soon after he was brought into the house he expired. [Arvine.

THE DEVIL'S CASTAWAYS.

Some ladies called one Saturday morning to pay a visit to Lady Huntingdon, and, during the visit, her ladyship inquired of them if they had ever heard Mr. Whitefield preach. Upon being answered in the negative, she said, "I wish you would hear him; he is to preach to-morrow evening." They promised her ladyship they would certainly attend. They fulfilled their promise; and when they called the next Monday morning on her ladyship, she anxiously inquired if they had heard Mr. Whitefield on the previous evening, and how they liked him. The reply was, "Oh, my lady, of all the preachers we ever heard, he is the most strange and unaccountable! Among other preposterous things, would your ladyship believe it, he declared that Jesus Christ was so willing to receive sinners, that he did not object to receive even the devil's castaways! Now, my lady, did you ever hear of such a thing since you were born?" To which her ladyship made the following reply: "There is something, I acknowledge, a little singular in the invitation, and I do not recollect to have ever met with it before; but as Mr. Whitefield is below in the parlor, we will have him up, and let him answer for himself." Upon his coming up into the drawing-room, Lady Huntingdon said, "Mr. Whitefield, these ladies have been preferring a very heavy charge against you, and I thought it best that you should come up and defend yourself. They say, that, in your sermon last evening, in speaking of the willingness of Jesus Christ to receive sinners, you expressed yourself in the following terms: 'That so ready was Christ to receive sinners who came to him, that he was willing to receive even the devil's castaways.'" Mr. Whitefield immediately replied: "I certainly, my lady, must plead guilty to the charge; whether I did what was right, or otherwise, your ladyship shall judge from the following circumstance. Did your ladyship notice, about half an hour ago, a very modest single rap at the door? It was given by a poor, miserable-looking, aged female, who requested to speak with me. I desired her to be shown into the parlor, when she accosted me in the following manner: 'I believe, sir, you preached last evening at such a chapel.' 'Yes, I did.' 'Ah, sir, I was accidentally passing the door of that chapel, and hearing the voice of some one preaching, I did what I never had been in the habit of doing—I went in; and one of the first things I heard you say was, that Jesus Christ was so willing to receive sinners, that he did not object to receive the devil's castaways. Do you think, sir, that Jesus Christ would receive me?'" Mr. Whitefield answered her that there was not a doubt of it, if she was but willing to go to him. This was the case; it ended in the conversion of the poor creature to God. When she died, she left highly satisfactory evidence that her great and numerous sins had been forgiven, through the atonement of the Lord Jesus. [Arvine.

THE FAMILY ALTAR.

Among all the treasured spots connected with my childhood's home, over which memory delights to linger, there is none more hallowed than the family altar.

From our earliest infancy, we were clustered at morn and eve around the family altar, each in his accustomed place, with Bible in hand, and all who were old enough, read in turn two verses each from the chapter of the sacred volume. The voices of the children accompanied the parents in a song of praise—then we were all committed to the care of our heavenly Father, and his blessing sought for us. Were any of the family in sickness or in trouble—were any about to leave home—the peculiar solemnity of father's petitions, as the situation of such an one was presented before God, is still vividly impressed upon my mind. One scene in particular, among those precious recollections, is indelibly fixed in my memory.

Our dear father had been long sick, very sick, and his recovery seemed doubtful; but while he was confined to a sick chamber and a bed of suffering, we were not denied the privileges and blessings of family worship. An elder brother's or a mother's loved, sweet voice, still implored God's healing mercy, and besought his daily blessings upon those in health.

Prayer was answered. The crisis was past, and slowly the invalid began to recover. One morning we were all as usual assembled in my mother's room, when feeble footsteps were heard upon the stairs. We listened in eager expectation, and pale, emaciated, leaning upon his staff, our dear father entered the room, and was seated again in the circle of the family altar, after an absence of long weeks. It was the first time he had left his sick chamber, and though some of our voices grew a little tremulous, we each read in turn as usual.

When the chapter was finished, he expressed his joy and gratitude in being permitted once more to join the family circle. He briefly narrated God's dealings with him since he had been separated from us—how his soul had been sweetly stayed on Christ, while his body had been racked with sufferings. Particularly I remember his description of his feelings one night when he supposed himself at the point of death. He had committed us all to the care of the God of the widow and the fatherless. He did not then regret having done so much for God, but so little; and prayed that God would forgive his unfaithfulness and remissness in duty. Oh, how strange appeared the idea to me, that he could ever have done wrong.

Most earnestly he besought us not to delay preparation for death, till we were laid upon a sick or dying bed, and assured us, that when racked with pain, or in a fever's delirium, we were not likely to make our peace with God, and that little reliance could be placed in a "death-bed repentance." And that prayer! Though a very little child then, the impression it made can never be effaced from my mind, as his voice, so feeble from long and severe illness, again led our devotions at the throne of grace.

With what earnestness and solemnity did he again commit us all to Him who seeth not as man seeth, and who leadeth us in ways that we know not, and how warmly did our hearts respond to the feelings as he poured forth grateful homage for the blessings of returning health.

"NONE LIVETH TO HIMSELF."

God has written upon the flower that sweetens the air, upon the breeze that rocks it upon its stem, upon the rain-drop that refreshes the smallest sprig of moss that rears its head in the desert, upon the ocean that rocks every swimmer in its chambers, upon every penciled shell that sleeps in the caverns of the deep, as well as upon the mighty sun which warms and cheers the millions of creatures that live in his light—upon all he has written, "None of us liveth to himself." Notwithstanding all that has been done to impress that important lesson upon our hearts, it is still one which the most of us are slow to learn, especially so as to exemplify it in our lives. We seem too generally to feel and act as though we were wholly independent of every thing around us, and under obligation to live for none but ourselves. Many evils result from this state of things, both to ourselves and others. The path of true happiness is the path which God himself has marked out for us. "None of us liveth to himself." Such is the intimate relation which we sustain to our fellow men, as beings formed for society, and to all the creatures of God, that none of us can live to ourselves. Our influence will be felt in some way, upon all with whom we have to do, and if it does not tell upon the promotion of their interests, it will result to their injury. Whatever may be the character of our influence, however, for it we shall be held responsible. It is our interest, therefore, as well as our duty, in all things, to live for others as well as for ourselves. We must seek the happiness of all with whom we have to do; and it is only when we are living under the influence of this principle, that we truly provide for our own interests.

LOSSES FROM RELIGION.

An aged couple, in the vicinity of London, who in the early part of life were poor, but who, by the blessing of God upon their industry, enjoyed a comfortable independence in their old age, were called upon by a Christian minister, who solicited their contributions to a charity. The old lady was disposed to make out some excuse, and to answer in the negative, both for her husband and herself; and therefore replied, "Why, sir, we have lost a deal by religion since we began; my husband knows that very well." And being willing to obtain her husband's consent to the assertion, she said, "Have we not, Thomas?" Thomas, after a long and solemn pause, replied, "Yes, Mary, we have lost a deal by our religion! I have lost a deal by my religion. Before I got religion, Mary, I had got a water pail, in which I carried water, and that you know I lost many years ago. And then I had an old slouched hat, a patched old coat, and mended shoes and stockings; but I have lost them also long ago. And, Mary, you know that, poor as I was, I had a habit of getting drunk, and quarreling with you; and that you know I have lost. And then I had a burdened conscience, and a wicked heart; and then I had ten thousand guilty feelings and fears; but all are lost, completely lost, and like a millstone cast into the deepest sea. And, Mary, you have been a loser too, though not so great a loser as myself. Before we got religion, Mary, you had got a washing-tray, in which you washed for hire; and God Almighty blessed your industry; but since we got religion, you have lost your washing-tray. And you had got a gown and bonnet much the worse for wear, though they were all you had to wear; but you have lost them long ago. And you had many an aching heart concerning me, at times; but those you happily have lost. And I could even wish that you had lost as much as I have lost, and even more; for what we lose by our religion, Mary, will be our eternal gain." We need not add, the preacher did not go away without substantial proof that Thomas deemed his losses for religion his most weighty obligations to the goodness of Almighty God, as the richest boon of grace on earth, and the most authentic pledge of glory in the world to come.

ADVICE TO PARENTS.—My father liked to have, as often as he could, some sensible friend or neighbor to converse with him, and always took care to start some ingenious or useful topic of discourse, which might tend to improve the minds of his children. By this means he turned our attention to what was just and prudent in the conduct of life, and little or no notice was ever taken of what related to the victuals on the table, so that I was brought up in such a perfect inattention to those matters, as to be quite indifferent to what kind of food was set before me. In after life this has been a great convenience to me, for my companions are often very unhappy for want of a suitable gratification of their very much more delicate tastes and appetites. [Franklin.

Let us never forget that every station in life is necessary; that each deserves our respect; that not the station itself, but the worthy fulfillment of its duties, does honor to the man; and that we only merit esteem in so far as we approach nearest to the perfect performance of the duties assigned to us in the order of things.

RELIGIOUS RIGHTS REPUDIATED.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

After weeks of intense suspense, I have just received the Opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of the Appeal of the Seventh-day Baptists of Pennsylvania to that Tribunal, for the restoration of their Constitutional Rights, filched from them by the law of 1794; which I enclose for insertion in your forthcoming paper; as many, all I may say, of your readers, are deeply solicitous of receiving their decision of that question.

Degrading as has been our faithlessness, as a nation, in the eyes of the world, to our treaties with the Sons of the Forest—and infamous as has been the prosecution of the unrighteous and unjustifiable war with Mexico, to extend the area of slavery—a deeper, more indelible infamy has been inflicted on the institutions of our Republic by this decision of the Supreme Court of the land of Penn, in putting under ban a Christian Society, for the exercise, the conscientious exercise, of the express and explicit injunction of the Most High; and thus setting at naught the dearest rights and immunities of freemen.

In coming to a decision, that the law enjoining the observance of the first day of the week, is constitutional, the Court waived, entirely, all religious considerations, knowing full well, that they could not sustain the observance of that day on any requirement of the Scriptures, but placed it solely on the ground of a mere "social and political regulation."

I have no time at present to make any remarks on this position, farther than to add, that if hereafter the Roman Catholics, or any other emulators of saint's days, should gain the ascendency in the Legislature of the Keystone State, and enact a law requiring that all the saint's days in the calendar, without so designating them, should be regarded, under fines and penalties, as "social and political regulations"—social and political rest-days—will the Supreme Court not be bound by this decision to affirm the constitutionality of the Act. If the Legislature have the right to enforce one day in the week as a "social and political rest-day," what is to prevent them from enacting that six of the seven days of each week shall be observed as "social and political rest-days." If they have the power to do one, they have the power to do the other likewise. In this decision the Court has violated the provisions of our Magna Charta, degraded the rights of conscience, and has virtually pronounced the Constitution of the State a cheat, a vile cheat; for it holds out clearly and distinctly equal rights and immunities to all its citizens, and here a preference is made for the Sunday sect, and a disablement enforced upon a portion of the community against laboring on a day that they do not conscientiously believe to be a sacred day, while, on the contrary, they faithfully and conscientiously observe the day and the only day required of them by the Lord of the Sabbath. What a libel is such a decision on our free institutions. The world will see it, and laugh our Constitution to scorn. The world may, also, soon behold a much more confounding spectacle in the freemen of America emigrating to Europe, to gain equal rights and religious immunities, denied to them in the much-vaunted "asylum for the oppressed of all nations."

If injustice and oppression have triumphed, there is some consolation to true Sabbath-keepers, in the fact, that the Court has not attempted to justify their decision by an appeal to the Scriptures, and we have the advantage still, in having the "thus saith the Lord" for our practice, and being able to defy all the sticklers for the sanctification of the first day of the week, to adduce one single command or requirement, enjoining or enforcing the religious observance of that day from the word of God. They may have the law of the land; we have the commandment of the Lord of Hosts. They hold the sacredness of their day under a power which pronounces sacred, and which guards and protects, some of the greatest vices of the age. We have our law from Him who cannot look upon iniquity with the least degree of allowance. We would despise such a figment for the sacredness of a day, as a human law merely regarding it as a "social and political regulation." Yet upon such grounds men can be intolerant persecutors of their fellow men, and at the same time trample under foot the requirements of their Lord and Judge.

P. S. I will endeavor to forward to you, in time for the outside form of your paper following your next forthcoming, the Argument of Thaddeus Stevens, Esq., on behalf of our rights, which I have now in my possession.

SUNDAY A LEGAL AND POLITICAL DAY OF REST.

Decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

The Supreme Court of this State, at Harrisburg, has now given its decision in the long-pending case of Specht vs. the Commonwealth. This case was argued some time since by Thaddeus Stevens and J. E. Brady for the plaintiff in error, and by Judge Nill, of Chambersburg, adversely. The facts of the case are, briefly, that the man Specht is a farmer and a Seventh-day Baptist, residing in Franklin Co., who was indicted for pursuing his ordinary avocations on Sunday—such as hauling out manure, &c.—and fined by the Court. He appealed to the Supreme Court, mainly, it would seem, to test, for his sect, the constitutionality of the law under which he was fined. The opinion of the Court, as follows, was delivered by Judge Bell, and is conclusive in favor of the constitutionality of the law.

Opinion read by Judge Bell.

The plaintiff in error stands convicted under the first section of the act of 22d April, 1794. It prohibits, inter alia, any person to "do or perform any worldly employment or business whatever on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, works of necessity or charity only excepted." It is said that as against those who conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week for the Sabbath, of whom the defendant is one, the statutory provision is in direct conflict with section 3d, art. 9th, Constitution of the Commonwealth. It ordains, "All men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience; no man can, of right, be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent. No human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and no preference shall be given by law to any religious establishment or modes of worship."

The question thus raised is not presented to the Court for the first time. It was here made as long ago as the year 1817, in the case of the Commonwealth vs. Wolf, (3 S. & R.; 4 S.,) and after argument, solemnly decided adversely to the position of the plaintiff in error. Until now, so far as we know, the soundness of this determination has not only passed unquestioned, but is incidentally recognized by other cases. Upon the maxim stare decisis, and looking only to the ordinary course of judicial administration, we might, perhaps, without impropriety, have decided to consider the question as not an open one in Pennsylvania. But impressed with the importance of preserving and protecting the unrestrained liberty of conscience guarantied by the Constitution of the United States, and of the several States of the confederacy, including our own, and desirous of retrieving any error which, by possibility, might have been committed in so grave an inquiry, we have given close attention to the ingenious argument addressed to us by the counsel of the plaintiff in error, who, it is understood, represents a portion of our citizens belonging to a respectable Christian sect, which claims and keeps the seventh day of the week as the true Sabbath. The conclusion at which we have arrived, after much reflection, is in consonance with that before announced by this Court in the case just alluded to.

The Constitution of this State secures freedom of conscience and equality of religious right. No man, living under the protection of our institutions, can be coerced to profess any form of religious belief, or to practice any peculiar mode of worship, in preference to another. In this respect the Christian, the Jew, the Mohammedan and the Pagan are alike entitled to protection. Nay, the infidel, who madly rejects all belief in a Divine Essence, may safely do so, in reference to civil punishment, so long as he refrains from the wanton and malicious proclamation of his opinions with intent to outrage the moral and religious convictions of a community, the vast majority of whom are Christians. But beyond this, conscientious doctrines and practices can claim no immunity from the operation of general laws made for the government and to promote the welfare of the whole people. In the language of Chief Justice Gibson, the right of conscience, as understood under our organic law, "is simply a right to worship the Supreme Being according to the dictates of the heart; to adopt any creed or hold any opinion whatever, or to support any religion; and to do or forbear to do, any act for conscience sake, the doing or forbearing of which is not prejudicial to the public weal," (Com. vs. Lesher, 17 S. & R. 16,) enforced in Simons vs. Gratz, (2 P. R. 416.) Does the act of Assembly in question impinge upon this natural right or on the constitutional declaration which seeks to foster and protect it? It is insisted, that this question must receive an affirmative response because, as it is said, the statute treats the first day of the week as a holy and sacred day, and prohibits labor as a profanation of the Lord's day, and it is thus proved to be, not a mere civil regulation to give rest to man, but an attempt to exalt, by law, the religious belief of certain sects over that of others.

Though it may have been a motive with the law-makers to prohibit the profanation of a day regarded by them as sacred—and, certainly there are expressions used in the statute that justify this conclusion—it is not perceived how this fact can vitally affect the question at issue. All agree that to the well-being of society, periods of rest are absolutely necessary. To be productive of the required advantage, these periods must recur at stated intervals, so that the mass of which the community is composed may enjoy a respite from labor at the same time. They may be established by common consent, or, as is conceded, the legislative power of the State may, without impropriety, interfere to fix the time of their stated return, and enforce obedience to the direction. When this happens, some one day must be selected, and it has been said that the round of the week presents none which, being preferred, might not be regarded as favoring some one of the numerous religious sects into which mankind are divided. In a Christian community, where a very large majority of the people celebrate the first day of the week as their chosen period of rest from labor, it is not surprising that that day should have received the legislative sanction; and as it is also devoted to religious observances, we are prepared to estimate the reason why the statute should speak of it as the Lord's day, and denominate the infraction of its legalized rest a profanation. Yet this does not change the character of the enactment. It is still, essentially, but a civil regulation made for the government of man as a member of society, and obedience to it may properly be enforced by penal sanctions. To say that one of the objects of the Legislature was to assert the sanctity of the particular day selected, is to say nothing in proof of the unconstitutionality of the act, unless in this the religious conscience of others has been offended and their rights invaded.

But it is argued, with apparent conviction of its truth, that to compel men to refrain from labor, solely from regard to the imputed holiness of a particular day is, within the meaning of the Constitution, to "control" the religious observance and to "interfere" with and constrain the consciences of those who, honestly, disbelieve the asserted sanctity of the selected day. We cannot assent to this. So long as no attempt is made to force upon others the adoption of the belief entertained by the governing power, or to compel a practice in accordance with it, so long is conscience left in the enjoyment of its natural right of individual decision and independent religious action. There is nothing to prevent the unrestrained expression of an adverse belief—though perhaps whith less of imposing effect than power lends to opinion, nor any hindrance offered to the full enjoyment of it, at least, so far as the exercise of religious devotion is involved. The error of the plaintiff's position is, that it confounds the reason of the prohibition with its actual effect, and thus mistakes the mere restraint of physical exertion for the fetters that clog the freedom of mind and conscience. But were this otherwise, the plaintiff's argument is inapplicable to the act of 1794.

The conclusions drawn from some of its language are as inexpressive of its practical operation as of the principal intent of its maker. The phraseology used may indicate a conviction of the holy character of the first day of the week, but as this simple expression of an abstract opinion, which all other men are at liberty to adopt or reject, carries with it no obligation beyond the influence attendant upon the expression itself, it cannot be said a primary object of the act was, authoritatively, to assert the supremacy of Sunday as of Divine appointment. Had such been the intent, irrespective of its statutory character as a day of rest from secular employment, its framer would not have stopped short with a bare interdiction of labor and worldly amusements. Following the example offered by older States and communities, they would have commanded the performance of religious rites, or at least, some express recognition of the day as the true Sabbath. Such a requisition, we agree with the plaintiff in error, would be a palpable interference with the rights of conscience. But nothing like this is exacted. On the contrary, every one is left at full liberty to shape his own convictions, and practically, to assert them to the extent of a free exercise of his religious views. In this, as in other respects, the conscience of each is left uncontrolled by legal coercion, to pursue its own inquiries and to adopt its own conclusions. In this aspect of the statute there is, therefore, nothing in derogation of the constitutional inhibition.

Nor so far as I can perceive is it obnoxious to this accusation in any other particular. It intermeddles not with the natural and indefeasible right of all men to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences; it compels none to attend, erect or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent; it pretends not to control or to interfere with the rights of conscience, and it establishes no preference for any religious establishment or mode of worship. It treats no religious doctrine as paramount in the State; it enforces no unwilling attendance upon the celebration of divine worship. It says not to the Jew or Sabbatarian, you shall desecrate the day you esteem as holy, and keep sacred to religion that we deem to be so. It enters upon no discussion of rival claims of the first and seventh days of the week, nor pretends to bind upon the conscience of any man any conclusion upon a subject which each must decide for himself. It intrudes not into the domestic circle to dictate when, where, or to what God, its inmates shall address their orisons, nor does it presume to enter the synagogue of the Israelite or the church of the seventh-day Christians, to command or even persuade their attendance in the temples of those who, especially, approach the altar on Sunday. It does not, in the slightest degree, infringe upon the Sabbath of any sect, or curtail their freedom of worship. It detracts not one hour from any period of time they may feel bound to devote to this object, nor does it add a moment beyond what they may choose to employ. Its sole mission is to inculcate a temporary weekly cessation from labor, but it adds not to this requirement any religious obligation.

Nor can it be objected against the statute that it gives a preference to any religious establishment or mode of worship. It leaves all free alike in the exercise of their distinctive religious tenets, saying to none, what dost thou? As I have said, the selection of the day of rest is but a question of expediency, and if from the choice falling on the first day of the week, the Jew and seventh-day Christian suffer the inconvenience of two successive days of withdrawal from worldly affairs, it is an incidental worldly disadvantage, temporarily injurous, it may be to them, but conferring no superior religious position upon those who worship upon the first day of the week. The law intends no preference. The command to abstain from labor is addressed to every citizen, irrespective of religious belief, and if an inconvenience results to some, it is a consequence of the generality of the provision. But this affords no argument against the constitutionality of the law, however strong the argument might be felt when addressed to the Legislature as a reason for a modification of the statute.

The only remaining ground upon which the plaintiff in error attacks the validity of the statute, is found in the assumption that, in conscience, he is as fully bound to attend to his secular affairs upon the first six days of the week as to cease from labor on the seventh. Were this so, the law which compels him to inaction upon one of the six, might well be regarded as an invasion of his conscientious convictions. But for this supposed article of his faith, his counsel refers us to no other warrant than that command of the decalogue which teaches, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy; six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." But without other evidence than the mere suggestion of counsel, we connot believe that the religious sect to which the plaintiff in error belongs have so construed this commandment as to make it imperative on its members, literally, to labor on every day of the week other than the seventh. Such is not, rationally, its meaning, nor is that assigned to the word by the ancient people to whom it was originally delivered by the Deity.

From the beginning even until now, it is regarded by them as intended to set apart a day of religious rest, but not as commanding six days of labor. Within six days the Israelite was directed to do all his work in order that he might devote the seventh uninterruptedly, to the service of God, but it was never imagined that he was under an imperative obligation to fill up each day of the other six with some worldly employment. In the Commonwealth vs. Wolf, the Court rightly repudiated such a notion, and in this it has been followed by other tribunals. Indeed the meaning of the command is so obvious as scarcely to leave room for construction, and accordingly so far as we are informed, the practice of all who profess to believe in the Old and New Testaments, has been in consonance with the original interpretation.

Beside the adjudications already referred to, the determination to which we have attained is fortified by the recent decision of the Court of Errors of South Carolina in the case of the City Council of Charleston vs. Benjamin, decided in January, 1848, and is not impeached by the city of Cincinnati vs. Rice (15 Ohio Rep., 225) cited by the plaintiff in error. This last case was determined upon the proviso of their statute, that nothing contained therein shall be construed to extend to those who, conscientiously, observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath. Did our statute offer a similar provision this controversy would probably never have arisen. Proceedings Affirmed.

☞ Knowing that our readers feel a deep interest in the subject of the foregoing article, we have thought best to make room for it this week, although in so doing we crowd out much matter prepared for the present number. At a future day we may have something to say upon the subject. Meanwhile we invite our correspondents to consider it, and give our readers the benefit of any light they may have.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION OF VIRGINIA NEGROES.

At a recent meeting of a Baptist ecclesiastical organization, called the General Association of Virginia, a proposition was made to appoint a Committee to inquire into the expediency of petitioning the Legislature to modify the laws relative to the religious instruction of the colored population. The subject excited a good deal of interest, and was very earnestly discussed. In the course of the debate it was stated, that the laws restricting the religious privileges of the colored population, are more rigid in Virginia than in any other State. In all other States, colored persons are permitted to preach; and in Georgia and Louisiana they officiate as pastors of colored churches. But in Virginia no such privileges are allowed them. And, indeed, it is said that the whites are restricted, for, by an existing law, the presence of a single slave at a night meeting in any of the churches in Virginia would render the whole congregation of white persons liable to imprisonment! Of course such an absurd aud ridiculous law could never be enforced; but it serves to show the spirit of slavery even in that State from which so many Presidents of our free country have come. Well, after the subject had been thoroughly discussed, and several amendments and substitutes to the first resolution proposed, the following was adopted with one dissenting voice:—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to petition the Legislature for such modification of the laws respecting the religious privileges of the colored population, as will admit of their assemblage at any time by the permission of their owners, in the presence of white persons, and will admit of their engaging in all proper religious exercises, provided they be conducted in the presence and under the supervision of a committee of white members of the churches to which they belong.

We are glad to see that the churches of Virginia feel the necessity of doing something in relation to the matter under consideration. But we are sorry to see a Baptist Association taking such low ground in relation to it. To ask that a large body of men may enjoy the privilege of worshiping God under the "supervision of a committee," is not the way that Baptists of old talked, or that Baptists of the genuine stamp now talk. Such maintain the right of every human being to worship God according to the dictates of conscience, and regard any Legislature which attempts to abridge that right as arrogating the prerogatives of the Almighty. If a denial of that right is necessary to support the institution of slavery, the fact ought to be known. The implication which is found in the action of this Association speaks volumes.

Encouraging Movement.—The Massachusetts Convention of Congregational Ministers, which embraces the Orthodox and Unitarian Clergymen of the State, adopted the following preamble and resolution at their late meeting. The proposition was introduced by Rev. Dr. Lowell, (father of James Russell Lowell, the Poet of Freedom,) who, though generally ranked as a Unitarian, has never been a partizan:

"Whereas this Convention is deeply impressed with the sinfulness and injustice of holding a fellow being in Slavery, and is convinced by all experience that the relation of master and slave is as destructive of the moral nature of the one, as it is of the human nature of the other; and whereas recent events have demonstrated, that non-slaveholding States are inextricably involved in some of the great public and private wrongs inherent to the system; and whereas, while it is at all times incumbent upon us, as men, to be faithful to the duties of a common humanity, as ministers to Him who came to unloose the heavy burdens, and bind up the broken in heart, it is especially our duty to "remember those who are in bonds as bound with them;" therefore

"Resolved, That a Committee of nine be appointed to prepare a Report, to be presented at the next annual meeting of this Convention, containing a brief history of the rise and progress of slavery in our country, a view of the responsibility of the Free States in regard to it, and a calm and temperate, but solemn and earnest appeal to the community on this momentous subject."

ANNIVERSARY OF THE ALFRED ACADEMY.

Alfred, July 2d, 1848.

The anniversary of the Alfred Academy and Teachers' Seminary was held on the 29th of June. The examination of classes commenced on the 26th, and continued to the 29th. The proficiency of students of all ages, from twelve to twenty-five, in those sciences which have heretofore been deemed so difficult of comprehension as to preclude the common scholar, evinced in a striking manner the superiority of the modern method of teaching over the stereotyped practice of former times. The promptness of expression and originality of thought evinced in mathematical demonstrations, and metaphysical definitions and discussions, were testimonials of the stern discipline of mind to which students had been subjected in the prosecution of their studies. The whole examination was a cheering index to the time when men and women shall evolve great and noble principles, by the tireless working of their own innate faculties, instead of referring to learned authors for every principle upon which to predicate their intercourse with the world. The number and proficiency of scholars in physical, intellectual, and moral sciences, indicated an attention to these long-neglected branches of education somewhat commensurate with their importance. The number in the languages, including Greek, Latin, French, and Italian, exceeded that of any former year. The exercises of the anniversary were such as to inspire every devotee of educational and moral reform with a new enthusiasm. Entire originality of thought was a prominent characteristic of the productions exhibited. The style of composition and delivery could not fail to recommend the study of rhetoric and elocution to all who essay at public speaking, while the liberality of views and benevolent sympathy which ran through the whole, should be a stern rebuke to those soul-shriveled sectarian babblers, whose utmost stretch of mind never extended beyond the precincts of their own miserable tenement. The kind attention of an audience numbering not less than two thousand five hundred, was a pleasing evidence of the satisfaction and approval of the patrons and friends of the school. The exercises were enlivened by music, vocal and instrumental, from the academy choir, and the Friendship and Andover bands. At the close of the exercises an appropriate and affecting address was made by Proff. Kenyon, to a graduating class consisting of three ladies and five gentlemen. The most consistent deportment was maintained by the crowded audience, and nothing occurred to disturb the good order of the day, except that a few loafers from an adjoining town made a display of the meanness to which humanity can descend, as well as an exhibition of the character of young men living in rum-selling communities. The exercises throughout were such as to inspire a hope that the educational interests of our country may occupy their appropriate place. All lovers of reform will unite in praying, that literary institutions may rise up and flourish all over the land, and adopt such systems of instruction as shall develop the whole man.

CHRIST IN THE TOMB.

A faithful band took down the ghastly form of their Master and laid him in the low, and silent tomb. Mother Earth received him to her embrace, and screened him in her compassionate bosom from the frowns of mortals. The funeral rites are performed, and that devoted band silently, sadly retire, leaving the orphaned universe to weep alone. There, in the grave, reposed God's only Son! With mingled feelings I contemplate him there—pale, how ghastly pale! There closed in death are those eyes, which were accustomed to beam with sympathy and love for the miseries of man! There closed in death are those lips, whose heavenly accents had so often lightened the burdens of afflicted humanity, and at whose word devils trembled. And there, cold and still lies that mangled hand, at whose gentle touch the blind had been made to see, the maimed to leap and walk, the sick to take up their bed and go to their homes in peace. And there, still in death, that heart which had so often beat quick in kindness and compassion for fallen and suffering man. There in the tomb slumbers God the Son! How great the change. From the throne of eternal glory, swaying the sceptre of the universe, reclining on the bosom of the Eternal Father, Emmanuel reposes in the lap of earth. He rests from the frowns and cold neglect of an unfeeling world. Still he is not at rest. A fierce contest is raging. He conquers Death, Hell, and the Grave. The third day he reäppears, and in majestic grandeur he soars aloft to the courts of the paradise of God; and as he mounts its eternal battlements, all heaven resounds with, "O death, where is thy sting; O grave, where is thy victory?"

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

We find but little to notice in the Congressional proceedings of last week. The principal subject of general interest before the Senate was the Oregon Bill, in connection with which the whole question of slavery was discussed, and especially the right of Congress to legislate upon the subject in the territories of the United States. No action has yet been taken upon the bill. The Senate had under consideration, but did not take final action upon, a joint resolution in favor of the just and fair settlement of the claims of the Cherokee Indians under the treaty of 1846. A joint resolution from the House was brought before the Senate in favor of fixing the 17th inst. as the period for the adjournment of Congress. Both branches of Congress received messages from the President, communicating the Ratified Treaty with Mexico, and requesting the necessary appropriations to meet its provisions.

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Caledonia arrived at New York on Sunday last, bringing seven days later intelligence from Europe, the substance of which will be found below.

England.

Aside from the Queen's intended visit to Ireland, for which preparations are being made, the principal subject of general interest in England is the Parliamentary Reform movement. On the 20th of June, Mr. Joseph Hume submitted the following motion to Parliament, which shows what is proposed :—

"That this House, as at present constituted, does not fairly represent the population, the property, or the industry of the country, whence has arisen great and increasing discontent in the minds of a large portion of the people; and it is therefore expedient, with a view to amend national representation, that the elective franchise shall be so extended as to include householders; the votes shall be taken by ballot; that the duration of parliaments shall not exceed three years; and that the appointment of members to population shall be made more equal."

France.

A meeting of representatives, who have hitherto supported the government, took place on the 21st inst., at the Palais Royal, at which it was agreed that they could be no longer maintained in power. We may, therefore, expect from day to day to hear of the resignation or removal of the present Executive Commission. What will replace it no one can tell. Complete anarchy exists, and order in the streets is only preserved by the determination of the National Guard.

The feeling in favor of Louis Napoleon seems to increase. Riots, in which his name is mixed up, are of daily occurrence in Paris, while many of the departments do not seem at all disposed to enter into the Republican views of the metropolis, and threaten to oppose them.

The London Herald of June 24, 1 o'clock P. M., publishes the following :—"News has this moment reached us by electric telegraph, that the crisis has really commenced in France. Yesterday, (Friday) the troops and National Guards were fighting desperately with the people. The sacrifice of life is terrific!

Italy.

Rivoli, in the north of Italy, has been taken by the Piedmontese, and 600 Austrians made prisoners. The Austrians have taken Vicenza. They also marched upon Padua, which city has been compelled to capitulate. The loss of the Italians in the attack on the city, amounted to about 1,800 or 2000 killed, wounded, and prisoners; while the loss of the Austrians did not exceed 500 in killed and wounded, including Major-General the Prince of Saxis, who was killed.

A bulletin of the Committee of War of Rome, of the 10th, states that among the Austrian soldiery, there were one hundred Austrian ladies, disguised in uniform, actually serving.

Austria.

There has been a bloody revolution at Prague. The people, or rather the students, demanded arms and ammunition of the Commandant, which were refused. This led to skirmishes, and finally to the bombardment of the city, and a horrible slaughter. The fury of the Czechs knew no bounds. They cut off the noses, ears, and lips, of all the soldiers that fell into their hands. No quarter was asked, and none given, Each man fought for life or death. At the latest date, June 18, the city had capitulated, and quiet was returning.

Disturbances at Pesth.—Serious disturbances occurred at Pesth, Hungary, on the 12th ult., in consequence of a quarrel caused by a theft alleged to have been committed by an Italian soldier on a Hungarian. The other Italians took part with their comrade, and intrenched themselves in their barracks, where they were attacked by the other troops and by the National Guards. Ultimately the Italians were forced to surrender, and tranquility was restored, though several men had been killed and wounded.

Storm at Berlin.—The City of Berlin, Prussia, was visited by a violent storm on the 13th inst., which was perhaps more violent in the environs than in the city itself. For an hour it was a perfect tornado; trees have been uprooted; on whole tracts of garden ground the produce is ruined, and the cherry harvest is nearly annihilated; the hailstones cut up every kind of tender vegetation, and the fields of corn are beaten flat. At Potsdam there was a serious loss of life; it being a holiday, a number of pleasure boats were sailing on the water called the Havel; the hurricane came so sudden that several were blown completely over, and many persons were drowned—the number not ascertained. A mill on the property of the Prince of Prussia, in the vicinity, was struck by lightning and burnt down, the Prince himself being a spectator of the conflagration. Two houses in the city were also struck, but without much damage. Some of the streets were knee-deep with water, the channels having choked. There has been no such tempest here in the memory of man.

The Cholera.—The last accounts from Moscow state that the cholera morbus is making frightful progress. Of 464 persons attacked, from the 23d to the 29th of May, no less than 205 died. The number of new cases on the 29th of May alone amounted to 81, and the number of deaths to 42. The cholera has also broken out with great intensity at Jaroslau, Robinski, and Kalooga, and thus appears to be gradually advancing westward.

From China.—Intelligence from China, dated May 24, has been received. It states that Mr. Consul Alcock had succeeded in the coercive measures he had adopted, and obtained satisfaction from the Chinese authorities at Shanghai, for the outrage on the English missionaries. The culprits, ten in number, are to wear the cangue for one month, at the spot were the offence occurred, as a warning to the multitude; and when the time expires they will be beaten, and be thus disposed of. Perfect tranquility prevailed throughout China.

* * *

The Case Altered.—A few days ago, a wag meeting a peasant, who was on his was to Bordeaux on business, said to him, "What are you doing here? They are about to divide all the lands of the rich, and you had better go to the mayor and put down your name for your share." The peasant set off at full gallop, and on arriving at the mayor's said, "Monsieur le maire, as there is to be a division of the land, I wish to have the meadow of M——, which joins my garden. Put down my name at the head of the list." The mayor turned over some papers, and then said, "You are not the first. I have an applicant who demands the meadow, and also your garden with it." "My garden! my garden! my garden!" said the peasant, in a fury. "I will go and get my musket," and he set to watching his garden day and night. There is a host of persons like this peasant; they wish to share the property of others, but keep their own.

What have Temperance Societies done?—As far as mere statistics go, it would seem by the following, from the Albany Spectator, that they have accomplished a vast amount of good. "There are now," says that paper, "more than 1,500,000 people in the United States who abstain from the use of ardent spirits, and from furnishing it to others; more than 5,000 Temperance Societies, embracing more than 500,000 members. More than 2,000 distilleries have been stopped; more than 5,000 merchants have ceased from the traffic. It is estimated that 30,000 persons are now sober, who, had it not been for the Temperance Societies, would have been sots; and at least 20,000 families are in ease and comfort, who would otherwise have been in poverty and disgraced by drunken inmates."

Great Improvement in Filtering Water.—A new and original invention has been introduced in England. It is a cylindrical filter, made of stone, and so constructed as to supersede all cleansing. The passing of the water through the stone frees it from all impurities in suspension, and, according to the testimony of an eminent analytical chemist, is calculated to benefit the public health materially. The filter is now in operation in many of the mansions of the principal nobility of the metropolis. The Lords of the Admiralty, struck with the utility of the invention as a means of preserving the health of officers and seamen, by rendering the water on board ship at all times pure and soft, irrespective of climate or time, have introduced it into the Royal Navy.

Effectual Preventive for Hydrophobia.—In the event of a bite from an animal in a rabid state or otherwise, sponge and wash the part, as soon as possible, with clear water, and then take good leaf tobacco, and make a bandage of it on the place bitten or lacerated. Change the bandage three or four times a day for a week; this will effectually absorb and extract any poison that may have lodged in the part bitten. If leaf tobacco cannot be obtained, take strong manufactured cut tobacco, and use it in the same manner. In America, the Indians carry the leaf tobacco with them, and when they are bitten by serpents, or other venomous reptiles, they use the leaf tobacco in the way described, and it is an invariable antidote to hydrophobia and other fatal effects. Gloucester Chron.

Outrage.—Rev. Henry H. Garnet, of Troy, whom many of our readers well know, was forcibly ejected from the cars on the Buffalo and Niagara Falls Railroad, just after the late Buffalo Convention, by a conductor named James Graham, on the plea that "colored people cannot be permitted to ride with the whites on this road, for southern ladies and gentlemen will not tolerate it." Mr. Garnet was considerably bruised, the ruffian conductor being assisted by another bully. But he bore himself with courage and dignity. We supposed the country had entirely outgrown such mean rascality as that.

Marrying a Deceased Wife's Sister.—The Court of Queen's Bench, England, has recently decided against the legality of all marriages made with a deceased wife's sister. By this decision all such marriages are canceled and declared null and void—the wives are placed in the light of concubines, the children of such marriages declared illegitimate, and all hereditary rights and claims to property utterly abrogated.

Light among the Germans.—The German Romanists in Newark and Patterson, N. J., have recently organized societies, where they receive Bible instruction from German Protestant clergymen. The Gospel light is penetrating dark minds on this continent as well as in Europe.

A novel spectacle for a Slave State occurred in Harrisburg, Kentucky, a short time since, which consisted of a temperance procession, got up by the "colored community" in that place. All the slaves that could obtain permission, for forty miles around, were in attendance.

SUMMARY.

We learn from Washington, that upon taking down the ball from the top of the lofty lantern, which was on the dome of the Capitol, it was discovered that it had been struck one or more times by lightning. The fluid had perforated it in three different places, and then, the ball being hollow, apparently coursed round the interior, until it escaped out of a single hole, nearly opposite to where it had entered. The ball is about 18 inches in diameter.

Her ankle joint was dislocated—one of the bones broken, and the flesh badly mutilated.

The Girard College is almost a failure at last. The architect has come out in a regular report against the work of his own genius, and declares that the reverberation of the recitation room is so deafening, that they will be useless for the purposes of their construction. The remedy proposed is to line the Gothic arches with false plain ceilings.

It is the general expectation of the Mexicans that Santa Anna will return to Mexico as soon as our army leaves that country. At Kingston, Ulster Co., N. Y., on the 4th, the friends of temperance erected a large tent, with a stage and seats inside, and as Mr. Gough was ascending the stage, the seats gave way, precipitating the people to the ground in great confusion, and we regret to add that several of the women and children were more or less injured by the breaking of limbs, &c. None, it is believed, are mortally injured.

THE FLOWERS OF GOD.

BY REV. J. G. LYONS.

The welcome flowers are blossoming,
In joyous troops revealed;
They lift their dewy buds and bells,
In garden, mead, and field;
They lurk in every sunless path
Where forest children tread;
They dot, like stars, the sacred turf,
Which lies above the dead.

They sport with every playful wind
That stirs the blooming trees,
And laugh on every fragrant bush,
All full of toiling bees:
From the green marge of lake and stream,
Fresh vale, and mountain sod,
They look in gentle glory forth—
The pure sweet flowers of God.

They come, with genial airs and skies,
In summer's golden prime,
And to the stricken world give back
Lost Eden's blissful clime:
Outshining Solomon they come,
And go full soon away,
But yet, like him, they meekly breathe
True wisdom while they stay.

If God, they whisper, smile on us,
And bid us bloom and shine,
Does He not mark, O faithless man!
Each wish and want of thine?
Think, too, what joy awaits in heaven
The blest of human birth,
When rapture such as woos thee now,
Can reach the bad on earth!

Redeemer of a fallen race!
Most merciful of kings!
Thy hallowed words have clothed with power
Those frail and beauteous things;
All taught by Thee, they yearly speak
Their message of deep love,
Bidding us fix, for life and death,
Our hearts and hopes above.

STORIES ABOUT LIONS.

A gentleman who had traveled in Southern Africa, some years since, tells a thrilling story of an adventure he had with a lion. He says, "The day was exceedingly pleasant, and not a cloud was to be seen. For a mile or two, we traveled along the banks of the river, which in this part abounded in tall mat-rushes. The dogs seemed much to enjoy prowling about, and examining every bushy place, and at last met with some object among the rushes which caused them to set up a most vehement and determined barking. We explored the spot with caution, as we suspected, from the peculiar tone of their bark, that it was, what it proved to be, lions. Having encouraged the dogs to drive them out—a task which they performed with great willingness—we had a full view of an enormous black-maned lion and lioness. The latter was seen only for a minute, as she made her escape up the river, under cover of the rushes; but the lion came steadily forward, and stood still to look at us. At this moment, we felt our situation not free from danger, as the animal seemed preparing to spring upon us, and we were standing upon the bank at the distance of only a few yards from him, most of us being on foot, and unarmed, without any visible possibility of escaping. I had given up my horse to the hunters, and was on foot myself; but there was no time for fear, as it was useless to attempt avoiding him. I, however, stood well upon my guard, holding my pistols in my hands ready for fire, and they who had muskets kept themselves prepared in the same manner. But at this instant the dogs boldly flew in between us and the lion, and, surrounding him, kept him at bay by their violent and resolute barking. The courage of these faithful animals was most admirable; they advanced up to the side of the huge beast, and stood making the greatest clamor in his face, without the least appearance of fear. The lion, conscious of his strength, remained unmoved at their noisy attempts, and kept his head turned towards us. At one moment, the dogs, perceiving his eye thus engaged, had advanced close to his feet, and seemed as if they would actually take hold of him; but they paid dearly for their imprudence, for, without discomposing the majestic and steady attitude in which he stood fixed, he merely moved his paw, and, at the next instant, I saw two lying dead. In doing this, he made so little exertion, that it was scarcely perceptible by what means they had been killed. Of the time which we gained by the interference of the dogs, not a moment was lost; we fired upon him; one of the balls passed through his side, just between the short ribs, and the blood began to flow, but the animal still remained standing in the same position. We had now no doubt that he would spring upon us; every gun was instantly reloaded; but happily we were mistaken, and were not sorry to see him move quietly away, though I had hoped in a few minutes to have been able to take hold of his paw without danger."

Another traveler relates an adventure in the same district of country, which proved to be much more serious. This gentleman was traveling in a large company, and they had stopped for the night. The story is told thus: "The wagons and cattle had been put up for the night, when, about midnight, they got into complete confusion. About thirty paces from the tent stood a lion, who, on seeing us, walked very deliberately about thirty paces farther behind a thorn bush, carrying something with him which I took to be a young ox. We commenced firing into the bush; the south wind blew strong, the sky was clear, and the moon shone very bright, so that we could perceive any thing at a short distance. After the cattle had been quieted again, and I had looked over every thing, I missed the sentry from before the tent. We called as loudly as possible, but in vain; nobody answered, from which I concluded he was carried off. Three or four men then advanced very cautiously to the bush, which stood nearly opposite the door of the tent, to discover, if possible, what had become of the man, but returned instantly in the utmost consternation. The lion, who was still there, rose up and roared furiously. About a hundred shots more were fired at the bush, without perceiving any thing of the lion; this induced one of the men again to approach it with a firebrand in his hand; but as soon as he reached the bush, the lion roared terribly, and leaped at him, on which he threw the firebrand, and the people having fired about ten shots, he immediately retired to his former station. The firebrand which had been thrown at the lion, had fallen in the midst of the bush, and, favored by the wind, began to burn with a great flame, so that we could see very clearly into and through it. We continued our firing until the night passed away, and the day began to break, which animated every one to fire at the lion, as he could not lie there without being entirely exposed. Several men posted at the farthest wagons, watched to take aim at him as he came out. At last, before it became quite light, he walked up the hill with the man in his mouth, when about forty shots were fired at him without molesting him in the least. He persevered in retaining his prey amid the fire and shot, and carried it securely off."

Several years ago, an Englishman named Lucas was riding in an open plain in South Africa, one morning about day-break; and "observing a lion at a distance, he endeavored to avoid him by making a wide circuit. There were thousands of spring brooks scattered over the extensive flats; but the lion, from the open nature of the country, had been unsuccessful in hunting. Lucas soon perceived that he was not disposed to let him pass without further acquaintance, and that he was rapidly approaching for an encounter. He being without his rifle, and but little inclined for closer acquaintance, immediately turned off at right angle, laid his whip freely to his horse's flanks, and galloped for his life. But it proved too late. The horse was tired, and bore a heavy man upon his back. The lion was fresh and furious with hunger, and came down upon him like a thunder-bolt. In a few moments he overtook Lucas, and springing up behind him, brought horse and man in an instant to the ground. Luckily the poor man was unhurt; and the lion was too eager in worrying the horse, to pay any immediate attention to the rider. Hardly knowing how he escaped, he contrived to reach the nearest house in safety."

Hunting the lion in Africa, is generally pursued for the sake of destroying the animal only, without any view of sport. A regular hunt, when the people turn out, is a complete scramble; a mixture of men of various figures and complexions, the dogs innumerable, and of every kind.

We must tell one story more, and then we will stop. One of the residents in South Africa, according to the Naturalist's History, shot a lion in the most perilous circumstances that can be conceived. We must tell the story in his own words. "My wife," he says, "was sitting in the house, near the door. The children were playing around her. I was outside, busily engaged in doing something to a wagon, when suddenly, though it was midday, an enormous lion came up and laid himself quietly down in the shade, upon the very threshold of the door. My wife, either stupified with fear, or aware of the danger attending any attempt to fly, remained motionless in her place, while the children took refuge in her lap. The cry they uttered immediately attracted my attention. I hastened toward the door; but my astonishment may well be conceived, when I found the entrance barred in such a way. Although the animal had not seen me, unarmed as I was, escape seemed impossible; yet I glided gently, scarcely knowing what I meant to do, to the side of the house, up to the window of my chamber, where I knew my loaded gun was standing, and which I found in such a condition, that I could reach it with my hand—a most fortunate circumstance; and still more so, when I found that the door of the room was open, so that I could see the whole danger of the scene. The lion was beginning to move, perhaps with the intention of making a spring. There was no longer any time to think. I called softly to the mother not to be alarmed; and invoking the name of the Lord, fired my piece. The ball passed directly over the hair of my boy's head, and lodged in the forehead of the lion, immediately above his eyes, which shot forth, as it were, sparks of fire, and stretched him on the ground, so that he never stirred more." [Youth's Cabinet.

THE DOGS OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

I had gone to walk in the "petit champs des morts," below the windows of the hotel, with my little niece. For some time it was very pleasant in the cool shades, which were perfectly deserted and quiet, but I could have wished them rather less so, when, to my astonishment, I saw in the course of a few minutes, the troops of those great, starved-looking dogs, of whose ferocity I had a tolerably just idea, were coming rapidly towards us from all quarters. I could not imagine what attracted them, till the poor child, quite pale with terror, showed me a piece of bread which she held in her hand, and which it was evident they had smelt at an incredible distance. In a moment we were surrounded by a perfect army of fierce, voracious animals, with their sharp teeth and glaring eyes, snuffing the air and closing round us. They looked as if they would have made but a mouthful of the poor little girl, round whom they circled, growling ominously, and coming nearer every instant; and they were scarcely less formidable to myself, when I took the bread from her, and began to feel that our position was really far from safe; for I dreaded that if I threw it away, it would be but a morsel to some one of them, while it was far from unlikely that those who were disappointed would turn their rage on us. Some of them were large and fierce enough to be no mean opponent even to a strong man; and I had heard of several instances of their attacking human beings. It was no use, however, to stand there, and watch them growing more and more furious, so I began imperceptibly to draw near the gate, dragging the child, quite paralyzed with fear, after me; the dogs, howling and raging, followed close, and even took my dress between their teeth. When I was close to the door, I flung the unfortunate piece of bread as far from me as I could, and while they all bounded towards it, we darted through the gate, and took a rapid turning in the path which carried us out of their sight at once. By a circuitous road we reached the hotel, and so escaped them; but the adventure inspired me with a very legitimate terror for these horrible dogs, who haunt this beautiful city more like beasts of prey after carnage than the domestic animals of an inhabited town. Economy in Cooking Cranberries.—To each quart of berries, very shortly after the cooking of them is commenced, add a teaspoonful of saleratus. This will so neutralize the acidiferous juice which they contain, as to make it necessary to use only one-fourth part as much sugar as would have been requisite had they been cooked without using saleratus.

THE HORNET'S NEST ON THE BARN.

My uncle was reading a paragraph in the newspaper, the other day, to this effect: that a certain man found a large hornet's nest under the eaves of his barn, and determined to destroy it. So he took some matches, tied them to a pole, and with them set fire to the nest, and totally destroyed it. Unfortunately, however, the barn was also burned, together with a thousand bushels of oats, and a large quantity of rye, hay, and other valuable stores. The loss was estimated at from twelve to fifteen hundred dollars, and there was no insurance on the property.

"Well, well," said my uncle, "Mr. Simmons was a fool! It's nothing new, however, for I've known the same thing done hundreds of times."

"What! burn down a house to get rid of a hornet's nest?"

"To be sure, my boy. What is a man doing when he drinks rum to cure disease?"

"Why, uncle, it may save his life."

"It may save it for a while, but it is apt to destroy it after a while. Look at your neighbor, Mr. Gruntly; he has been for a year trying to burn out a pain in the breast, by firing his stomach with brandy, and the eaves of his house are on fire now."

"That's true, uncle; but then Mr. Gruntly has a weakness, for which he drinks brandy."

"Exactly, and so has every man that drinks a weakness. The weakness is sometimes very great. There's Mr. Carbuncle, who has been dosing for dyspepsia—burning out the hornet's nest with rum, till the front of his house is in a blaze. Mr. Carbuncle's whole concern will soon be in ashes. I tell you, my lad, many a fellow that stands high in life, is as big a fool as Simmons. It's all dead loss, too—no insurance—not a farthing. Mind what I say, Peter—never do you make such a fool of yourself, as to set fire to your house for the sake of burning out a hornet's nest."

ALLIGATORS IN WESTERN AFRICA.

During my residence at Mansu, about fifty miles from Cape Coast Castle, I was engaged in building a house. One day I sent out the school boys to collect some bamboos for the purpose of erecting a fence. In the course of their search for them, they discovered the nest of an alligator, which they robbed of its eggs. These eggs are thought to be a great delicacy, and are anxiously sought after by the rich. These, therefore, were distributed among the chiefs and principal people; and I being thought a person of some consequence, had two given me as my share. On their being brought to me, my curiosity was excited to see the nest, and I asked the boys to show me the place where they had found it. The alligators had chosen the root of a large tree, around which grew a great number of gigantic climbers so common in tropical countries. The nest was composed of loose vegetable matter, which they had collected together from the ground around the tree, and which was so carefully done that one would have thought it had been swept. They had then drawn it among those large climbers, and matted it so firmly together that it resembled a piece of coarse felt; and it was with great difficulty that it could be separated in order to obtain the eggs. The heap thus formed consisted of at least a large wagon load of this vegetable matter, and the heat was so great arising from the fermentation and gradual decay of the mass, that it was with difficulty that I could hold my hand in it for five minutes at a time. In this we see the goodness of God manifested towards even this portion of his creation, in directing their instinct to avail itself of the steady heat generated by the fermentation of a mass of decomposing vegetable matter, constructed by itself, for the purposes of incubation.

NURSES.

Next to the physician, a good nurse is of the utmost importance to the sick; and it is almost as necessary that a nurse should be trained to the business, as that a physician should be properly educated. Kindness, cheerfulness, attention, and firmness, are all necessary in a good nurse. A knowledge of the laws of health, both theoretically and practically, is also indispensable. The female is more frequently called upon to perform these duties. Nature seems to call upon her to be the nurse of the child, sister, brother, husband, father, and mother. Every young lady, then, should understand how to perform this duty well. It should form a part of her domestic education. A knowledge of this duty can no more be dispensed with, than a knowledge of good housewifery. Every young woman, then, should become thoroughly acquainted with the principles of physiology. We would not oppose the efforts made to instruct young ladies in music and graceful deportment; yet still, we must be allowed to say, it would be much better for families, communities, and the world, if no inconsiderable portion were deducted from the time spent upon securing what are called the polite accomplishments, and bestowed upon acquiring a knowledge of how to take care of the sick. We have seen the most bungling work in the sick room, from the ignorance, carelessness, and sluttishness of a nurse. On the other hand, the sick chamber has seemed almost desirable, when the nurse is what she should be.

Three Poets in a Puzzle.—I led the horse to the stable, when a fresh perplexity arose. I removed the harness without difficulty, but, after many strenuous attempts, I could not remove the collar. In despair, I called for assistance, when aid soon drew near. Mr. Wordsworth brought his ingenuity into exercise, but after several unsuccessful efforts, he relinquished the achievement, as a thing altogether impracticable. Mr. Coleridge now tried his hand, but showed no more grooming skill than his predecessors; for, after twisting the horse's neck almost to strangulation, and the great danger of his eyes, he gave up the useless task, pronouncing that the horse's head must have grown, (gout or dropsy) since the collar was put on, for he said, "It was a downright impossibility for such a huge os frontis to pass through so narrow a collar!" Just at this moment a servant girl came near, and understanding the cause of our consternation, "La, master," said she, "you don't go about the work in the right way. You should do this," when turning the collar completely upside down, she slipped it off in a moment, to our great humiliation and wonderment, each satisfied afresh that there were heights of knowledge in the world to which we had not yet attained. [Cottle.

Just like Washing.—One of the most celebrated physicians of Philadelphia was recently summoned to attend a sick child, by its mother, who, as all mothers should, felt much alarmed at the ill-health of her cherub. The doctor, after looking at the child and feeling its pulse, ordered the mother to fill a large tub three parts with water—then get a pound of good yellow soap, and a coarse towel; put the child into the water, and keep it there until it was thoroughly bathed and rubbed—the soap being applied freely the while.

"But, doctor," said the mother, "you mean to order some medicine, don't you?"

"For the present this is all that is necessary. On Monday morning I will call again."

When he came on Monday, the child was perfectly well.

"Why, doctor," exclaimed the mother, "this is very strange. It is just like washing."

"Very like, indeed," answered the doctor, as he took his leave.

To Stop the Progress of Decay in Old Trees.—Choose a dry day for the operation, and have the decayed wood cleaned completely and carefully out, so as to leave none to spread infection again to the sound part. Have ready, in a vessel that can be kept hot in the garden or orchard, a mixture of one part rosin and three parts clean greese, which, while hot, apply with a paint brush, if the cavity be small, or a white-wash brush if it be large, and put a thick covering of it over the newly exposed wood; then fill the hollow with earth. I have known a very old and much decayed tree so treated, that seemed to be completely renovated, and continued to flourish for many years, and would probably still have survived, had it not been blown down during a severe ice storm three years ago.

A Monkey's Fun.—A monkey, tied to a stake, was robbed by the crows, in the West Indies, of his food, and he conceived the following plan of punishing the thieves. He feigned death, and lay perfectly motionless on the ground near to his stake. The birds approached by degrees, and got near enough to steal his food, which he allowed them to do. This he repeated several times, till they became so bold as to come within the reach of his claws. He calculated his distance, and laid hold of one of them. Death was not his plan of punishment. He was more refined in his cruelty. He plucked every feather out of the bird, and then let him go and show himself to his companions. He made a man of him according to the ancient definition of a "biped without feathers."

To Stew Gooseberries.—Top and tail them. Pour some boiling water on the gooseberries, cover them up, and let them set about half an hour, or till the skin is quite tender, but not till it bursts, as that will make the juice run out into the water. Then pour off the water, and mix with the gooseberries an equal quantity of sugar. Put them into a porcelain stew-pan or skillet, and set it on hot coals, or on a charcoal furnace. In a few minutes you may begin to mash them against the side of the pan with a wooden spoon. Let them stew about half an hour, stirring them frequently. They must be quite cold before they are used for anything.

VARIETY.

Rev. John Pierpont, whose devotion to the temperance cause, and the persecutions he has endured for his "opinion's sake," have rendered his name dear to every feeling heart, once said, on rising to address a large concourse of people—"If there be an individual—a single one—man, woman, or child, in this vast assembly, who has not suffered, either directly or indirectly, from intemperance, O let that person stand up, that I may feast my eyes on the first one I have ever seen who has escaped." He paused and looked around him, but no one stirred. An expressive silence confessed that all felt the smart of this universal scourge.

The excellent and eccentric Rowland Hill, when once in Scotland, was found fault with because he had not heads and particulars in his sermons. When he next ascended the pulpit, he made an apology for past omissions, and announced that he should now have four heads—how many particulars he did not yet know—first, he should go round about his text; second, he should come up to his text; third, he should go through his text; and fourth, he should go away from his text.

The editor of the New Haven Journal has been shown a land turtle, by Mr. Elias Bassett, of Hampden, which he first found upon his farm more than forty years ago, and marked with his initials, "E. B.," with the date of "1800," which are yet very plain and distinct. He does not appear to have varied in size since the inscription, and hence it is inferred that he was of age at that time. The question now is, how many hundred years do they live?

It is stated that Daniel Webster speaks at the rate of from eighty to one hundred and ten words per minute; Gerritt Smith, from seventy to ninety; Dr. Tyng, from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and forty; Mr. Botts, from one hundred to one hundred and twenty; Mr. Clay, one hundred and thirty to one hundred and sixty; Mr. Choate and Mr. Calhoun, from one hundred and sixty to two hundred.

A Yankee orator, out west, vindicating his native Connecticut against slanders which have been uttered against her, said:—"As to Connecticut boys manufacturing horn flints and wooden nutmegs, I plead guilty to these charges! They did manufacture wooden nutmegs, but they had to leave the State before they could find purchasers!"

At one of our hotels a bill of fare was handed to a respectable looking gentleman, as he was taking his seat at the dinner table. He deliberately put on his spectacles, and glancing his eyes over its contents, folded it up and put it into his pocket, at the same time apologetically remarking to the waiter, that he hadn't time to read it then, but would look it over after dinner.

In a churchyard in the north of England is this epitaph:—

> "Here lies (alas!) and more the pity,
> All that remains of John Newcity."

To which is attached the following:—

"N. B. The man's name was Newtown, but it would not rhyme."

Every member of the school will be exercised in composition, and in reading or speaking select pieces.

In respect to government, the experience and observation of the Faculty have convinced them, that while they hold the reins firmly in their own hands, the object is best secured by teaching their pupils to govern themselves, and thereby calling into exercise the higher and nobler faculties of their nature, and promoting the refining and restraining elements of social influence.

The friends of the Institution have met with a success surpassing their most sanguine expectations, and hope by a laudable effort of all interested in its welfare, to make it a flourishing and respectable school. Correspondence may be addressed to the Principals, or to Ira Spencer, of DeRuyter or Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., Agents.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, }
IRA SAYLES, } Principals,

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

| | |
|---|---|
| Board, per week, | $1 00 |
| Room-rent, per term, | 1 50 |
| Tuition, per term, | $3 50 to 5 00 |
| Incidental expenses, per term, | 25 |

EXTRAS PER TERM.

| | |
|---|---|
| Piano Forte, | $10 00 |
| Oil Painting, | 7 00 |
| Drawing, | 2 00 |

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

VALUABLE REPUBLICATION!

CARLOW'S DEFENSE OF THE SABBATH

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY have just issued a new and revised edition of George Carlow's pungent and heart-searching Defense of the Lord's Sabbath. This work, originally published in London in 1724, probably surpasses, in the scope of the argument and the clear elucidation of the subject, any other work of its size extant. Its original and somewhat antiquated phraseology, has been much improved, and the work somewhat abridged by the omission of occasional repetitions. The Society ask for it a general circulation. It is published in mailable covers at 15c., or fine muslin gilt back and side 30c., or full gilt 56c. Orders, addressed to the General Agent, Paul Stillman New York, will be promptly attended to.

SKETCH OF THE
ARGUMENT OF THADDEUS STEVENS, IN THE CASE OF

JACOB SPECHT,
THE COMMONWEALTH.
Question.—Is the 1st Section of the Act of 22d April, 1794, unconstitutional?

May it please the Court: This record raises the question of the constitutionality of the Act of 22d April, 1794. The first Section of the Act provides that "if any person shall do or perform any worldly employment or business whatsoever on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, works of necessity and charity only excepted, et cetera, every such person, so offending, shall for every such offence forfeit and pay four dollars to be levied by distress; or in case he or she shall refuse or neglect to pay the said sum, or goods and chattels cannot be found whereof to levy the same by distress, he or she shall suffer six days' imprisonment in the house of correction of the proper county."

At common law it was no offence to transact innocent business on Sunday. It is made criminal by Act of Assembly alone. That act of Assembly, we contend, violates the 3d Section of the 9th article of the Constitution of Pennsylvania, which is as follows:

"All men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience; no man can of right be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry, against his consent. No human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and no preference shall be given by law to any religious establishment or modes of worship."

We are aware, that more than thirty years ago this question was decided against us by the Supreme Court of this State, by two Judges, one of whom was just closing a long life of usefulness, and was then of great age. The other was just entering upon his judicial career. But questions of much less importance to the happiness of society, and the unalienable rights of man, have been, not unfrequently, reconsidered by this Court. An important principle of the law of evidence, which has stood the test of more than forty years, and of repeated deliberate decisions of this Court, was lately reversed and totally changed in Post vs. Avery, and subsequent cases, because it was believed to work injustice in questions of property. The Legislature, as in this case, had refused to alter the law as established in Steele vs. the Phœnix Insurance Company; and the Court, in the exercise of an undoubted right, corrected it themselves. We are, therefore, bold to ask them to re-judge and correct the judgment of the Supreme Court in a question which deeply effects and grieves the consciences of inoffensive and pious men, eminent for honesty, peacefulness, and orderly conduct.

Does this Act of Assembly "control or interfere with the rights of conscience?" It evidently treats the first day of the week as a holy, a sacred day; and it prohibits labor on that day, not for the purpose of giving rest to man, as a mere civil regulation, but because it profanes the Lord's day. The 4th Sec. of the Act provides that:

"The Justices of the Supreme Court, severally, throughout this State, every President of the Courts of Common Pleas within his district, every Associate Judge of the Courts of Common Pleas, and every Justice of the Peace within his county, et cetera, are empowered, authorized, and required, to proceed against and punish all persons offending against this Act, and every person who shall profane the Lord's day—and for that purpose, the said Magistrate may and shall commit such offenders on his own view—and in a summary way inquire into the truth of the accusation on the testimony of witnesses—and if the person so committed neglect or refuse to satisfy such forfeiture immediately with costs, or produce goods or chattels thereon to levy such forfeiture with costs, then the said justices or magistrates shall commit the offender without bail or mainprize to the house of correction of the county wherein the offence shall be committed, during such time as is herein before directed, there to be fed on bread and water only, and to be kept at hard labor."

We have other holidays. We have political sabbaths, such as the 4th of July, and 22d of February. We reverence them as days of great political events. But we do not enforce their observance by legislation. But the act in question compels all to observe Sunday as a sacred day. To oblige men to refrain from labor out of regard to its holiness, is to "control" their religious observance, as much as if they were ordered to kneel before the altar, or the images of the Saints. And to all those who conscientiously believe that it is not a holy day—that it is not the true Sabbath of the Lord, it is an "interference" with, and a constraint of their rights of conscience. It is no answer to say that the day of rest should be uniform among all. If it were a mere civil regulation, there might be some reason in it; but then it would be made a day of recreation—of relaxation; and most probably those days would not come so frequently. The French, when they discarded its religious character, when they worshiped the Goddess of Reason, and provided only for the rest of the people, fixed the tenth day. But I suppose it requires no other argument than reading the several acts upon this subject, to prove that our legislation looks to enforcing the religious observance of the day. If the Legislature can direct that religious observance, then there is no limit to their power over religious subjects. If they can direct the people to stay at home quietly, they can direct them to go to church, and if they can direct them to attend church, they can indicate the church to be attended. In short, if they have any power over religious subjects, they have all power. Such power would be a perfect union of Church and State, so much abhorred by the people of this Republic. It would inevitably lead to religious persecutions, and finally to civil and religious tyranny.

The doctrine that the "Christian religion is a part of the common law," is, I suppose, the foundation and justification of this act. That doctrine was promulgated in the worst times, and by the worst men of a government that avowedly united Church and State; in times when men were sent to the block or the stake on any frivolous charge of heresy. To deny transubstantiation or the supremacy of the Pope, was a capital offence under one reign; and to admit them was a capital offence under another. Men were punished as blasphemers for denying the divinity of our Saviour, because the "Christian religion was a part of the common law." Men were executed in great numbers by the civil power for denying the real presence, because that was a part of the Christian religion—and the Christian religion was a part of the municipal law. When the Protestants gained the ascendency, to believe in the real presence was contrary to the Christian religion, and therefore a violation of the law, and punished by the secular arm. For it is truly observed: "That no set of men were ever found willing to suffer martyrdom themselves for conscience's sake, who would not inflict it upon others the moment they obtained power."

As late as the nineteenth century, this pernicious doctrine led Lord Eldon to decide that Unitarians may be punished as blasphemers at common law, and not treated as Christians, notwithstanding the repeal of the Statute of 9 and 10 William the III.—(3 Marivale, 353 Atty. Genl. vs. Pearson.)

How dangerous, therefore, is the apparently pious doctrine that the "Christian religion is a part of the common law!" If it be true, all who disbelieve that religion, are habitual breakers of the law. The Jew, the Hindoo, the Pagan, are perpetual malefactors. They, of course, are beyond the protection of the law, or continually subject to punishment for conscience's sake. These consequences of the doctrine were very satisfactory to the English Government, in its origin. They enabled the tyrants of the 15th and 16th centuries to find a convenient excuse for sending to the block any one who became obnoxious to them. If such tyrant were a Roman Catholic, the heresy of the reformation was sufficient. If he were a Protestant, adhering to the Church of Rome was equally so. This lauded principle found ready advocates in such bloody tools of tyrants as Jeffries, Audley, and Rich.

What else was it but the doctrine "that the Christian religion was a part of the law," and to be enforced by the civil arm, that gave the Holy Inquisition such horrid force, and placed the civil and religious liberty, and the lives of nations of men, at the mercy of the bloodiest power that ever inflicted misery upon the human race, in the name of Demons or of Gods!

This convenient doctrine enabled Henry the 8th to dispose of all whom he chose to call his enemies, whether they were learned and conscientious gentlemen, like Sir Thomas More; or were wives, of whose beauty he was weary. His successor, after robbing all the Jews of the Kingdom of all their wealth, either sent them to death or banished them from the Empire. And he was right, if this principle be right, for they were always violating the law, and of course deserved punishment.

If this doctrine is to be the rule of action, where do you find its interpretation? Where are to be found adjudged decisions of what this law teaches, so that the people may escape the perils of its violation? Are they to be seen in the doings of the council of Nice, or the Diet of Augsburg? Are they in the bulls of Hildebrand, or the writings of Luther?—in the rigid doctrines of Calvin, or the more liberal opinions of Wesley? Does this part of the "common law" (adopted in Pennsylvania,) command us to bow down before the image of the Virgin and the Saints; or, discarding all visible symbols, to worship the Unseen God? This doctrine must drive us for refuge to the infallible Church of Rome, where the decrees of the Pope are the unerring rule of this part of the "common law."

Those who have a sincere regard for the Christian religion, can fear no greater evil to it than to have it mingled with affairs of State. Those who love civil liberty must shudder at the idea that this doctrine is ever to prevail in this Republic. Its practical results may be found in the fires of Smithfield; in the dungeons of the Inquisition; in the desolation of Italy, and the moral and political degradation of Spain. It is true, there was a time when this dangerous doctrine had a practical existence in some of the American colonies. The Pilgrims, who had been driven by it from their native homes, and took shelter in the forests of New England, brought with them the very spirit which possessed the tyrants who expelled them. Some of their first acts of legislation regulated the religion of the people. Frequent, cruel, and disgraceful punishments were inflicted for thoughts and opinions, which concerned only the creature and his Creator. Quakers were executed because they did not worship God as the Pilgrim Fathers did. Witchcraft was a capital crime. In short, all oppression of conscience has arisen from this fatal doctrine.

But when the great men of the Revolution set about establishing a government, which should secure the liberties of the people, they took especial care that the civil administration should be separated from affairs of Church. They left questions of mere sin to be settled between God and His creatures. They left every man to judge of the requirements of Heaven as his own conscience might dictate. And to Heaven alone they left the judgment and the sanction.

The Constitution of almost every State in the Union contains a section securing liberty of conscience.

The Constitution of the United States, as originally adopted, had no such provision.

But the first Congress that met under it, added the following amendment:

"ART. 1. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

This article is not as comprehensive as the one in the Constitution of Pennsylvania.

It has already received a construction by both the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, which has a strong bearing on the present question.

In the sessions of 1829 and 1830, a large number of moral and religious persons sent memorials to Congress, setting forth:

"That the memorialists regard the first day of the week as a day set apart by the Creator for religious exercises, and consider the transportation of the mail, and the opening of the post offices, as a violation of it," and prayed for their suppression.

Two committees of the House and one of the Senate were charged with these memorials, and made reports which were adopted by the respective bodies. The one made by the committee of which R. M. Johnson was chairman, became particularly celebrated, and has done more to establish a permanent reputation for the chairman, than all his warlike deeds, however gallant. These reports maintain, that to compel men to refrain from work on the first day of the week because it is set apart as holy, would be a violation of the Constitution: (Vide Report of 4 and 5 March, 1830, House.) To declare any day to be the true Sabbath, and more holy than another, would infringe upon the religious belief, and grieve the consciences of some portion of our citizens. It would bring us back to that fatal evil of all other governments, the union of Church and State. For all governments but ours, whether Pagan, Mahomedan, or Christian, have directed religious worship by human laws. Hence, all the bloody persecutions that the world has seen. It is a melancholy truth, that those who believe in one God, have been more intolerant than Pagans. Polytheism, however erroneous, by allowing the worship of numerous gods, became indulgent to the introduction of new ones. But the Mahomedans, the Jews, and above all, I am compelled to say, the Christians, have been guilty of the cruelest persecutions that ever afflicted the human race. True, the Romans, instigated by the Jews, put to death many of the early Christians. But where do we find anything to compare with the religious murders of England, Germany, and France—with the tragedy of the Cecilian Vespers? More blood has been shed by the familiars of the Holy Inquisition, than was ever offered a sacrifice to their hideous deities on Pagan altars. Nor can this spirit of holy ferocity be ever restrained so long as the civil power is lent to support religious belief.

Seeing this, the fathers of the Revolution took care that our government should be wholly disconnected with all religions. Instead of that being a defect, connecting them together in any way would greatly injure both.

Such was the opinion of the celebrated reports to which I have referred, and which were ratified by both branches of Congress.

I think I may safely say, that the Constitutions of the United States and of Pennsylvania, are founded on no religion, but on purely civil considerations—on the inalienable rights of man; one of which is, that man shall not interfere with the rights of conscience.

The Constitution of South Carolina contains the following provision: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall hereafter be allowed within this State to all mankind; Provided, That liberty of conscience thereby declared, shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of the State."

This provision, qualified by the proviso, is not nearly as strong as ours.

The City Councils of Charleston passed an ordinance, prohibiting under penalty, all worldly employment on the Lord's day—"to preserve peace and good order within the city"—thus proposing to bring it within the proviso. In 1836 a Jew sold goods on Sunday, and was prosecuted under this ordinance. Judge Rice, a very able and learned Jurist, decided that the ordinance was unconstitutional and void. The opinion is elaborate and able, but has since been reversed on the strength of the proviso in an opinion more pious than able. (Law Rep. for May 1848, p. 7.)

Virginia had previously declared a similar ordinance of Richmond void.

The Supreme Court of Ohio, in the 15th vol. of her Reports by Griswold, page 225—the city of Cincinnati vs. Rice—declared a like ordinance void, as against those "who conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath."

The section in her Bill of Rights is an exact copy of ours.

So far then as the authority of the United States, and of other States goes, this Act is unconstitutional. And it seems to me it would be a reproach to this State, if it were not declared so.

But suppose it were competent for the Legislature to prohibit labor on the Sabbath, on account of its sacred character, it is certainly not competent for them to declare which day of the week is the Sabbath. That would be a palpable "interference with conscience." For I suppose it will be admitted that there is an honest diversity of opinion on that subject. My clients are firm believers in the holy character of that day, and they strictly keep it, as the record shows. But they believe that the Lord, who alone had the power to fix it, rested the seventh day, and sanctified it as His Sabbath. And that designating the first day of the week as the Lord's day was a mere human invention.

Is there not enough in sacred history to justify honest and intelligent men in holding such opinion, without being stigmatized as "capricious." God having labored six days, rested the seventh, and sanctified that day, as we are told in the history of creation. But I am not aware of any injunction to man to keep it holy, until God condescended to give laws to the Jews after their flight from Egypt.

One of the Ten Commandments, given from the smoking top of Mount Sinai, says:

"Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy; six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt not do any work."

Here the time in which man shall work, and in which he shall not, is fixed by Deity himself in a manner too solemn to be forgotten or disregarded. It was pronounced with the voice of a loud trumpet, amidst the lightnings and the quakings of the Mount. And this day has been always kept by the Jews, from that time to the present; and by the early Christians until the fourth century. (Vide Justin Martyr and Origen, passim.)

Our clients believe that part of the decalogue which commands them to work six days, to be as binding on them as that which directs them to rest the seventh. And it must be confessed, that so far as earthly interests are concerned, it is quite as important. Did the world generally hold that salutary belief, and act accordingly, we should have less need of poor-houses, jails, and vagrant laws.

But if conscience directs them to work six days, and forbids them to work the seventh; and if the Act in question prohibits their working on the first day of the week; then such Act "gives a preference to other modes of worship." It allows some six full days to labor, and restrains others to five. This subtraction of one additional seventh of their time of labor, and consequently of their means of profit, operates as a penalty on their religious belief.

It will not do to say that they are not compelled by law to work six days; they believe themselves to be so commanded by the Decalogue—and that the Act cutting off one of those days runs counter to the Eternal mandate.

Our Saviour kept the Jewish Sabbath, but seems to have treated all days as holy alike. After his crucifixion, his disciples assembled not only on the first day of the week, but on many other days. But when their first day is spoken of, it should be remembered that it commenced at sunset in the evening, and ended the next evening. "For the evening and the morning were the first day." They usually met at night; of course it was on our seventh day. My clients believe that the Christian dispensation has not abrogated the Sabbath fixed by the law of God. They believe the Saviour to have been sincere when he said: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law and the Prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill." 5th Matthew, 17. And again: "It is easier for Heaven and Earth to pass away, than for one tittle of the law to fail." 16th Luke, 17.

It may seem unimportant to men of loose or liberal religious notions, which day is kept as holy, provided there be uniformity. But it weighs heavily upon the consciences of my clients, who sincerely believe that the neglect of that injunction will bring upon them the eternal wrath of the offended Law-Giver. Rather than expose themselves to that anger, I doubt not they would sacrifice property, liberty, and even life itself. All these the Legislature may wrest from them, if this Act be constitutional.

The first day of the week came to be treated as the day of worship among Christians after the conversion of Constantine from Paganism. He had previously worshiped the god Apollo, whose sacred day was the first day of the week. When he abandoned Apollo for Christ, he retained some of the relics of Paganism. Among the rest was the holy day of his ancient god. By a formal decree, he directed his subjects who lived in towns and cities, (he exempted country people from it on account of inconvenience,) to worship God on the "day of the Sundie solis." Hence that day came to be called "Sunday." His decree may be found at length in the "Corpus Juris Civilis, Book 3, Tit. 12," in these words:

"Omnes Judices, Urbanaeque plebes, et cunctarum artium officialis venerabali die solis, quiescant. Ruri sed tamen et cetera."

Our Act of Assembly is but a copy, and an enlargement of this decree of a bloody despot, who earned the glory of saintship by assisting at the Council of Nice, and enforcing its decisions by his civil magistrates. (Eusebius, Bishop of Cesarea.)

"The 4th section of our Act enjoins upon Judges and Magistrates to proceed and convict in a summary way, all persons who shall profane the Lord's day, as aforesaid; and if the forfeiture be not paid, to commit the offender without bail or mainprize to the house of correction to be kept at hard labor on bread and water only."

Religious intolerance could not invent a more odious law; nor one more repugnant to our Constitution; and more opposed to the noble and independent injunction of St. Paul: "Let no man therefore judge you in meat and in drink, and in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days." Col. 2d, 16, 17. Can this Act be held consistent with religious liberty, by an independent Judiciary of the land of Penn, which was sought out and settled as a refuge from religious persecution, by its great founder, who, holding all days equally sacred, allowed all men to judge of such questions for themselves, without hindrance from the civil power? If so, we have unhappily retrograded; we have gone back to the days of the Henries, of Philip and Mary, of the repeal of the edict of Nantes; while the States of the South have almost redeemed the stigma of their crushing domestic slavery by adopting the true doctrines of religious liberty!

Is not the same spirit embodied in this Act that kindled the fagots around the Martyrs of Europe; and which gave a melancholy immortality to the Rock of Plymouth?

It is no answer to say that a majority of the Legislature can repeal it. The great glory of written, paramount constitutions—that noblest invention of the New World—which was forged and fashioned in the purifying fires of the Revolution, is, that they protect minorities against the will of majorities. Were it not for this necessity, written, uncontrollable constitutions would be useless. The true, if not the only way in which a Judiciary can acquire a name, which shall be respected while they are here, and shall live when they are dead, is to stand by the Constitution, and interpose their protecting shield between the many and the few. If they fail to do this out of respect to a majority, that sovereign of Republics, history, will rank them with Scroggs, and Impey, and Rich, who sacrificed the rights of conscience and of humanity to please their sovereigns. It was this same influence—the voice of the PEOPLE, crying, "crucify him! crucify him!" that bore down the judgment of Pilate, and made him the judicial murderer of HIM, who suffered for conscience's sake. When the temples of Justice cease to be a refuge for the oppressed, there will be none left for them on earth.

Mr. Jefferson, when seeking for a lasting foundation for his fame, passed by the authorship of the Declaration of Independence, and caused to be inscribed upon his tombstone, that he was the "Founder of the University of Virginia, and the author of the Statute for religious toleration." He thereby showed the independence of his character, and the soundness of his judgment; for education and perfect religious freedom are the foundation of all true liberty. Can they trust to popular justice, or an Executive trembling before the people? Let the unhappy Mormons answer. Because they were foolish enough to believe, and independent enough to express, the belief that the golden plates of Mormon were as authentic as the tables of Moses, an infamous majority of their Christian neighbors voted them out-laws, murdered their prophets, robbed them of their property, expelled them from their homes, and drove them as exiles to the shores of the Pacific Ocean. Although this was all planned and avowed in open day, and proclaimed for months, yet they found no protection from a weak, despicable Executive, who stood in greater awe of the sovereign people, than he did of the Constitution, which he had sworn to support. If the Constitution sleep, is there any safety in the teachings of the pulpit? Every sect is orthodox itself, and all others are "no better than one of the wicked." All should respect true religion, but none should give it civil power or aid except to protect it. It thereby becomes debased. Do not the clergy, almost universally, find justification in Scripture for sustaining, or at least acquiescing in the ruling temporal power? Did they not there find the "Divine right of Kings?" If the Ruler be a despot, they still remember that they are to "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." If they live in a country whose domestic institution is unmitigated slavery, they find in ancient Scripture accounts of barbarous nations, where man forgot that his fellow man was a brother. To contend with them against the temporal interests of their church, that the Christian doctrine intended to give freedom of conscience, and freedom of action to all the children of one blood—of one common Father, would be idle—would be a wasteful scattering of the pearls of reason and religion before the fat and rending swine of the altar.

To the Judiciary then, and to them alone, can civil and religious liberty look for relief, when assailed by majorities forgetful of the true principles of our government. That they will prove true to their high duties, we have the most confident hopes.

"YOUR SIN WILL FIND YOU OUT."

Dr. Donne, afterwards the celebrated Dean of St. Paul's, when he took possession of the first living to which he was inducted, walked into the yard of the church where he was to officiate. It happened that as he sauntered along, the sexton was digging a grave, and the Doctor stood for a moment to observe his operations. As the man was at work, he threw up a skull which in some way or other engaged the Doctor's attention. While he examined it, he perceived a headless nail, which perforated the temple, and which convinced him that some dreadful deed must have been perpetrated. Taking up the skull, he demanded of the grave-digger to whom it belonged. The man instantly said, that he knew very well—that it had belonged to a man who was accustomed to excess in the use of liquor; and who, one night having been guilty of his usual intemperance had been found dead in his bed in the morning. Dr. Donne then asked, "Had he a wife?" The answer was in the affirmative. "What character does she bear?" The sexton said, "A very good one, only she was reflected upon for marrying immediately after the death of her husband." This was enough for the Doctor, who, upon the pretence of visiting all his parishoners, soon called upon the woman in question; and in the course of conversation he inquired of what sickness her husband had died. She gave him precisely the same account as the sexton had given before her. But the Doctor produced the skull, and pointing to the place, said, "Woman, do you know this nail?" The unhappy criminal was struck with horror at the demand and the sight, and instantly owned that she had been the perpetrator of the deed, which had hurried her husband, in a state of intoxication, into the eternal world.

GOOD ADVICE.—That was capital advice given to a pious son by Rowland Hill, to preach nothing down but the devil, and nothing up but Jesus Christ.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, July 20, 1848.

SACREDNESS OF THE CIVIL REST-DAY.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I embrace the earliest moment of leisure, from most arduous duties, to indite a few remarks, to accompany the Argument of Thaddeus Stevens, Esq., before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, on the Sunday case, recently tried before that tribunal; which I have had in my possession some time, but held it back out of respect to the Court, until their decision, which they were very tardy in arriving at, should be delivered; as I did, also, from the same consideration, deference to that tribunal during the pending of the case, withhold, since last fall, a work which will form a volume of upwards of an hundred octavo pages, designed to exhibit an unvarnished narrative of the early history, the recent persecution, and the struggle of the German Seventh-day Baptists of Pennsylvania to maintain their civil rights and religious immunities; which I deem to be an imperative duty to transmit to posterity, that future ages may judge, understandingly, of our position and our principles—the wrongs and injuries inflicted on a Christian Society, of good report, in the middle of the nineteenth century—a period distinguished for the dissemination of liberal opinions and expanded views of human rights and the immunities of conscience, even in the most rigidly despotic countries.

Mr. Stevens' main argument was directed to combat the assumed position, that "Christianity is the common law of the land," and which he did in the most masterly and conclusive manner. Whatever may be the common law of our so-called mother country, England, our Constitution supersedes it entirely. It can not be claimed in any country, where they have a Constitutional Government, and in which it is not, specially, made part of the organic law; nor can it be inferred, save where a union of Church and State is recognized and actually exists. He might have gone farther, and contended, that if admitted, that Christianity is the common law of our Republic, so far from its militating against our cause, it would operate in our favor; for we claim to be Christians, and to have the true Christianity of the Bible—that we have all our practices founded on the practice and example of the Divine Founder of Christianity, and would be perfectly willing to rest the issue on that point—that we adhere to the Christianity of the New Testament—that the Sunday-sect have departed from the law of the King in Zion, have sought out many inventions, and instead of preserving their loyalty to their rightful Law-Giver, are following "the commandments of men." While they countenance and maintain a pagan institution—the worship of a day, dedicated by the heathen idolaters to the Sun, and which is not commanded to be so regarded in the Scriptures, we observe the day required by the Almighty—the day recognized by the Master, the Head of the Christian church. The admission that Christianity is the common law of the land, could, legitimately, do us no damage—be no detriment, whatever, to our cause. We are recognized as Christians, and are on a common platform with all other Christians—entitled to the same rights and immunities. The Supreme Court has no power to make inquisition and determine between the shades of Christian doctrine and the conscientious practice of religious rites; and this they saw clearly, as the issue proves. That would be too delicate a matter to touch—too glaring an usurpation to assume, though that tribunal has tortured the rights of conscience into a very circumscribed, contracted nut-shell. Religious conscience is a sacred treasure; and in that we have decidedly the advantage over the Sunday-sect; for our conscientious regard for the Sabbath, is founded on the express word of God, while our oppressors cannot adduce a single commandment, from the Scriptures, to show that their conscience, in regard to His holy day, hinges on any requirement of the Master. Yet, while the Judges shrank from the flagrant act of adjudging between Christian sects, openly, still they did not hesitate to fritter away the strong claims, the strongest and dearest rights of the soul, into a mere matter of expediency. More of this hereafter.

The other principal point of Mr. Stevens' argument, was, to show, that the law of April 22, 1794, under which our people are persecuted, is unconstitutional, inasmuch as it sets up and enforces Sunday, as a sacred, a holy day—as a religious institution; for it expressly declares the first day of the week to be the "Lord's day," and gives it a religious character by imposing penalties for "profaning" it, as a day sacred and holy —which could not be profaned unless invested with a religious character. This was so self-evident, that the Court acknowledged, that it possibly was the motive of those who enacted the law; yet while the motive was not constitutional, the statute might still be so, shorn of its superfluous intent; and I have reason to believe, that this point was a serious stumbling-block with the Bench in coming to a decision. One or two of the Judges were not only willing, but anxious, to declare it a religious institution—a sacred day—possessing holy obligations on man to reverence it; while at least one was decidedly opposed to that view of it; and the majority would never have consented to affirm the constitutionality of the law on that ground; yet they had not the moral courage to brave the prejudices which would have followed a reversal of the former judgment. The present decision, I think, is a compromise—the only platform on which they could unite to affirm the constitutionality of the law, namely, a civil regulation, a mere "social and political day of rest," without any reference to any sacred character whatever; and which will be equally sacred, should any future Legislature see fit to change it to fourth day or any other day of the week. They never would, they never could, have been brought to decide it on the ground of being a holy, a sacred day.

Thus, we have gained something; we might have gained more had there not been prejudiced, bigoted partizans on the Bench. The temper of the Court, and our chances with it, may be inferred from an extract of a letter before me, written by a gentleman—a Sunday man, yet one of liberal heart—who was present at the pleadings. "Judge Coulter, (says the writer,) could not hold in, whilst Mr. Brady was pressing certain points upon the Court; and when he, in concluding his argument, expressed a hope, that if the Court felt themselves bound, by former precedent, to affirm this judgment, the day was not far distant, when the Legislature would repeal the Act of 1794, and extend the rights of conscience to all, he (Coulter) rather ill-naturedly remarked, that 'they would first have to dethrone the Almighty!' So much for bigotry, without pure religion or liberality, (continues the writer.) Burnside, of course, swears that it would be destructive of Christianity to decide in favor of the plaintiff in error. Bell is with you. Gibson and Rodgers have not intimated any opinion either on or off the Bench." With such inveterate prejudices and sworn opposition on the Bench, arrayed against plain, obscure, honest-hearted Believers, what could be expected in the case? So far from our case having a fair and impartial consideration from all the Judges, it was prejudged by more than one long in advance of the Argument. A year ago, one of the Judges, on meeting one of our Counsel in the State Library, a room vis-a-vis to the Court room, in the same building, accosted him somewhat thus: "Well, sir, they say you are engaged in the Sunday case." On the attorney nodding assent, the Judge continued, "G—d d—n your eyes, I'll floor you." A worthy Judge, indeed—a right redoubtable defender of Constantine's day—a paragon of an advocate for a pagan institution. Such Christian charity and blasphemous piety was meeted out to our friends in advance. No one can imagine the influence brought to bear against us in this case. The clergy throughout the land, were indefatigable in their efforts, to influence the result, and left no stone unturned to accomplish their ends. One of their number, even as far "down east" as the extreme end of Vermont, volunteered a lecture, a severe anathema, in a written epistle, to one of our Counsel, for consenting to advocate our cause. With such inveterate prejudices, and such jesuitical influences, could we expect any thing better?

However, not any decision, short of a full recognition of our rights and immunities, and an award of exemption from the operation of that iniquitous law, could be more calculated to soothe our disappointment, than the decision of the Court. The Court has given the "cold shoulder" forever, in the Keystone State, to the sacredness of Sunday—stripped it entirely of all the sanctity and holiness claimed for it. With whatever sacredness it was invested as a religious institution, and whatever were the motives of the makers of the law, in designing to confer upon it the character of a sacred, a holy day, the Court has, unhesitatingly, shorn it completely of those pretensions. If, then, we have not gained our point, the advocates for the sacredness of the first day of the week have gained a great loss. The Court has declared to the world, that whatever may have been the motives of the law-makers, or the wording of the Act, they do not recognize it as conferring any sacredness on it, but that they regard it only and merely as a civil rest-day, to be changed to any day of the week, at the pleasure of the Legislature. This is the basis of their decision, and therefore all the sacredness it derives from the statute, and possesses in the eyes of the Supreme Court, is from human legislation. Alas! for the sacredness of Sunday—Constantine's "Christian Sabbath!" The same power may throw the same shield over Easter and every other holy day of the calendar, as it does around the retailer of "liquid fire and distilled damnation;" and the same power may throw the shield of protection and sacredness over trafficking in human flesh, around gambling establishments and race-courses; all of which are done in some of the States. They give them sacredness and security on the same grounds, and by the same power, that the law of Pennsylvania gives sacredness to the first day of the week. Truly have the sticklers for Constantine's day gained a loss, a great loss, an irretrievable loss.

Whether its greatest advocates ever believed it to possess any holiness, or whether the decision of the Supreme Court, which was first published on the seventh instant, has torn away the film from their eyes, I cannot divine; yet a funny matter followed so closely on the heels of that decision, within the atmosphere of the court-room, that I cannot but presume that that decision has dissipated all regard for the holiness of the day of the Sun, among its quondam admirers, from the fact of the Governor of the State executing a civil, political act, not one of "mercy or necessity," but purely from political considerations, on the very next "civil rest-day." And so ludicrous, in inconsistency, is this act, and some matters connected with it, and so important may be its bearing on the questions it may give rise to hereafter, that I am constrained to introduce the transaction, at length, as a "sign of the times"—a commentary on "profession and practice." Two days, two short days, after the decision of the Supreme Court was announced, publicly, Governor Shunk, whose health has been on the decline for some time past, was induced, at the instance, the incessant importunity of some craven politicians, to resign his office as Chief Magistrate of the State, on the ninth instant, Sunday! Otherwise, in the event of his death, the Speaker of the Senate, a Whig, the constitutional successor, for the interregnum, would discharge the duties of acting Governor, twelve months longer; and from this political consideration he was induced to resign on Sunday, "the holy, Christian Sabbath"—ostensibly, that the election for a successor might take place at the ensuing election in October, but in reality to prevent the Speaker of the Senate from exercising the duties, and being in fact Governor, a year longer.

Had this been purely an act of necessity, a State act in an extremity, there might be some show of an excuse for desecrating "the sacredness of the holy Christian Sabbath," but as the Governor, who was fully aware of his impending fate for some time past, might have done so some days sooner, as he was repeatedly urged to do, on a legal day, or might have delayed a few days longer without any detriment to the public service, it is strange, passing strange, that men can be found thus to tamper with "holy time." What a wax-nose these people do make of the holy Scriptures, and of the holy civil rest-day. As it was done from political considerations, party purposes, and was no State act in an extremity, it must be illegal and invalid. The Constitution makes ample provision for an event of that kind, death or resignation; therefore, there was no necessity for executing that civil act on that day; and as no civil act is valid when executed on that day, the resignation of the Governor cannot be affirmed by the Supreme Court, before which it may be brought for adjudication, in accordance with the established precedents of that tribunal, which has decided on other occasions, that any and all civil acts, or contracts, done on that day, are null and void.

This act may open a curious question in the Keystone State, and may have a considerable bearing on the recent decision made by the Supreme Court in our case. The law regulating elections requires the Proclamation of the Speaker of the Senate, to be issued three months before the ensuing election, to supply a vacancy in the office of Governor, by death or resignation; while the Constitution simply says, that the resignation of the Governor must be made three months before the election ensuing, to have a successor elected at that time. The Governor resigned just in time to have it registered, though it was on Sunday, to be in three months before the election; but the Proclamation cannot be issued in time. Here arises the difficulty. The election will go on; but which ever party may be defeated, they may question the legality of the proceedings, and an appeal be taken to the Supreme Court; and in the issue, the legality of the Governor's resignation will come up. Peradventure it may be brought up on a Quo Warranto!

Here was a Sunday business with a vengeance. The resignation was signed, attested, handed over in form by a learned Judge to the Secretary of State, registered and certified to by the proper officer—all for party, political purposes—on Sunday, "the civil day of rest;" and what is the queerest part of the business, is, that one of the witnesses to the act of resignation, is a Doctor of Divinity—a most strenuous advocate for the "sacred stillness" and "devout observance of the holy Sabbath"—one who has been wont to speak, from the pulpit, in accents of most solemn, fearful admonition, to his hearers, as if man's whole future destiny hung on one act of desecration of that day, or as if giving the least countenance to any secular affairs was sufficient to seal his doom forever! Such was his holy horror against desecrating the first day of the week—"the holy Christian Sabbath." I am at an utter loss to understand, how so great an advocate for the sacredness of that day, could so far forget his own solemn admonitions to his congregation, as to certify to a civil instrument—a political act—on that day. He is no politician—he was not, I am sure, actuated by any political consideration. What can it mean? Has the recent decision of the Supreme Court destroyed his sense of the sacredness of Constantine's day, or did he certify to the resignation, as a Minister of the Gospel, to sanctify the deed? Does he consider, that, in virtue of his office, he is competent to certify to other civil matters than matrimony, on a day he himself regards as sacred, and unequivocally desecrated when any other individual executes any civil act, or performs any secular labor? If so, we have fastened upon us, what the Constitution expressly prohibits—a privileged class; and, as history proves, the worst of all privileged classes, the priesthood.

These sticklers for the sacredness of the legal rest-day, do perpetrate many funny, laughable things. Within a few weeks past, the ludicrous spectacle was exhibited in a meeting-house, dedicated to the worship of the Majesty of Heaven, in a village not an hundred miles from this place, which church owning and occupying the building regularly, regards the first day of the week as the "Christian Sabbath," the "holy Sabbath," and are the most strenuous advocates for the Sunday law, actually permitted, countenanced, and encouraged, the sale of books, in their meeting-house, after their regular service, and from the "sacred desk," on a Sunday evening—and did it with impunity. O consistency, thou art a jewel!

Such are the workings of the "civil rest-day" in Pennsylvania, and the Sunday law in New Jersey—"fish for one, and flesh for the other." The projectors, the law-makers, and the executive officers, are the first to violate it, and violate with impunity; while other honest citizens, who have no lot nor part in making such unequal, iniquitous laws, are persecuted and fined for not being alike inconsistent in their professions and practice of religious duties. "Tell it not in Gath," says David Benedict, one of the most aged and venerable ministers of the First-day Baptist denomination, in his 'General History of the Baptist denomination in America and other Parts of the World,' recently published, in noticing the persecution of the German Seventh-day Baptists in Pennsylvania—"Tell it not in Gath, (he exclaims,) publish it not in the streets of Askelon, that in this land of freedom, any religious community, so distinguished as this has been for piety and good order, should be harrassed and persecuted, fined, imprisoned, and maltreated, as many of the observers of the ancient Sabbath, both German and English, have been for a conscientious observance of their peculiar opinions. Tell it not in the Roman Vatican, in the Spanish Inquisition, or any tribunal, civil or ecclesiastical, that any legislative body in this free Republic, should authorize any portion of citizens to insult and injure another, because they differ from them just twenty-four hours in the time, which in their opinion should be devoted to the worship of their Maker." Yet, even so the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has decided.

I have not time at present to review the opinion of the Court, and point out some of its absurdities and contradictions; but in conclusion only add, that the tide-bound Sunday-sticklers, though they approve the award, are much more dissatisfied with the principles on which the award was rendered, than the Seventh-day Baptists themselves. Judge Coulter, though exceedingly anxious for declaring the constitutionality of the law in question, yet expressed his dissent, on the bench, to the reasoning of the delivered opinion of the Court, and maintained the propriety and necessity of sustaining, distinctly, the religious character of the day; and the swearing Judge, more zealous than pious, but who, Pilate-like, feared the populace more than he cared for the day, declared the delivered opinion, to which he assented, "a Pagan opinion." It is truly a Pagan opinion in more than one sense. But it was the only way that they could obtain an award for the constitutionality of the Act. As I have already intimated, it was a compromise; and as Judge Bell was regarded as inclining to favor our rights, it was given to him to deliver the Opinion of the Court, and clothe it in a manner that might make it palatable enough for him to swallow. It was a bitter pill, even for the Bench to swallow, and much more so for the Sunday folks. Still their end is attained, though it entails a wanton, irreparable injury on other free men of the State. While all the other nations of the earth are making rapid advances in liberal opinions, and especially in regard to religious rights, Pennsylvania has taken a retrograde step, and thrown herself back into the bigotry and intolerance of the dark ages—the days of the Inquisition and proscription for conscience sake. AN OLD MINISTER.—A correspondent of the Christian Reflector and Watchman says that the Rev. Thomas Snell, D. D., of North Brookfield, Mass., preached his half-century sermon on the 27th ult. It was founded on Acts 26: 22, 23—"Having therefore obtained help of God," &c. In this sermon, he gave a simple account of what the church and town were when he came there, their present condition, and the means used to effect the change. In reply to the question how he had remained fifty years the pastor of one church in this age of ministerial change, he stated—1. That he had always tried to gratify the wishes of his people so far as he could consistently. 2. He had never supposed that wisdom would die with him, but if with any body, with his people. 3. He had never suffered himself to take sides with any faction that has arisen in his church or society. 4. He had always been content to preach the simple doctrines of the cross and the duties that immediately grow out of them. A large number of the former inhabitants of the town were present, and the speeches from them and other visitors from abroad, added not a little in recalling the reminiscences of by-gone days. There are three contiguous parishes whose pastors' ages average 76. A whole generation has grown up and died; and nearly all their present congregations, when they were ordained, were unborn. Most of the parents of the present generation were married by these venerable patriarchs, and by them accompanied to their graves.

CAN'T TAKE CARE OF THEMSELVES.—In a letter from the Corresponding Secretary of the N. Y. State Colonization Society to the editor of the Commercial Advertiser, mention is made of a slave family of six persons, who have redeemed themselves, and now propose to leave this land of boasted freedom for Liberia, in hope of enjoying real liberty there. The father is a carpenter, and has paid two thousand three hundred dollars for himself, and one thousand three hundred dollars for his children. Such are the men who "can't take care of themselves," and must be kept in slavery or sent out of the country, for fear that they will become a tax upon the whites!

MISSIONARIES DROWNED.—Letters recently received from China bring the sad intelligence, that Dr. J. S. James, and his wife, missionaries of the Southern Baptist Board to China, were drowned on the 15th of April last. It appears that soon after their arrival at Hong Kong, they went, on the invitation of an American ship-captain, to visit Canton. In returning by a schooner, they were overtaken by a squall, upset five miles from Hong Kong, and seven persons drowned, among whom were Dr. and Mrs. James.

LATE FROM MR. ABBOTT.—The Macedonian has a letter from Mr. Abbott, dated Sandoway, Feb. 12, full of Christian ardor and hope. He had just spent five or six weeks visiting the Karen churches in the jungles, of which he gives interesting accounts. The thirty native preachers, too, won his approval, with a single exception, for the manner in which they had performed their duties during his absence. One of the native pastors during that period had baptized 600, and another 550. Mr. Abbott speaks of districts north of Bassein and Pantanau where 1,200 converts wait for baptism.

LARGE DONATIONS.—On the fourth of July, Augustus Graham, Esq., of Brooklyn, gave the Brooklyn Institute twenty thousand dollars, and on the same day he gave to the Brooklyn City Hospital twenty-six thousand five hundred dollars; having previously given it five thousand five hundred dollars. Of this aggregate sum of thirty-two thousand dollars, he appropriates thirty thousand to the Hospital proper, and the remaining two thousand to the creation and support of a Dispensary branch, with certain specific directions as to the application of the former sum.

SUCCESS OF THE GOSPEL IN COLORADO VALLEY.—A correspondent of the South Western Chronicle says that within the last six or eight months, from the best information he has been able to get, there have been from five to six hundred who have professed religion in the Colorado Valley, including Baptists, Methodists, and Cumberland Presbyterians, amongst whom there is much unity of feeling. He thinks the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom in Texas is the great object of each denomination.

NOTICE is hereby given, that Bro. Sebeus M. Burdick is restored to the communion and fellowship of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Lincklaen.

By order and on behalf of the church.

THE CHURCH IN BERLIN, N. Y.—Information reached us several weeks ago, that there had been a revival of religion in the vicinity of Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y. We now learn, from Bro. J. L. Scott, the preacher at Berlin, that the work was very powerful and extensive, affecting not only the Sabbath-keeping Church at Berlin, but also that at Petersburg, and other churches in the vicinity. Nearly fifty persons have been added to the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Berlin, several to the Petersburg Church, and some have joined other churches. The change is said to be very great and happy.

In this connection it may not be amiss to say, that our brethren in Berlin are now occupied in enlarging and improving their meeting-house —a work in which they have engaged with a zeal and liberality worthy of all praise.

We regret to learn that Father Satterlee, long the venerated pastor of the Church in Berlin, is now in very feeble health. He has been for some time past confined to his house, where meetings have occasionally been held for his gratification.

---

THE CHURCH IN PETERSBURG, N. Y.—Some of our readers know, that for a considerable time past the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Petersburg, Rensselaer County, has been in a depressed condition, without a preacher, and often without Sabbath meetings. We are glad to learn that things are assuming a better aspect there. Last spring Bro. Libbeus Cottrell, of Union College, spent a few weeks in laboring among that people, which was followed by a gathering of the church together, and something of an awakening. Since he returned to his studies, Eld. John Green has visited them and spent several weeks. They are now making an effort, in which it is believed they will succeed, to secure the labors of a minister.

THIRD BROOKFIELD CHURCH.—A business letter from Bro. Ephraim Maxson, dated Edmeston, N. Y., July 11, says that on the Sabbath previous four persons were baptized by Eld. Samuel B. Crandall. Among them was Mr. Benjamin Stillman, a man eighty-three years old, who espoused the cause of Christ in his youth, but has not until now followed his Saviour in the ordinances of the Gospel. Another was formerly a member of the Methodist church, and was sprinkled on her admission to it; but when she became acquainted with our people, she thought it her duty to be baptized and join a Sabbath-keeping church.

THE SABBATH, AND SUNDAY LAWS.—From a business letter, dated at Ulysses, Potter Co., Pa., May 26, we clip the following paragraphs:—

"Four adult persons, professors of religion, have embraced the Sabbath of the Bible in this place, within a short time.

"An elderly gentleman, and one of the most respectable men in this county, was fined a short time since, for a breach of the Sunday laws. He had a load of goods come in late the night previous, and because he removed them to his store on Sunday, there was a complaint entered against him by a worthless drunkard, to gratify a revengeful disposition. Thus the Sunday laws, instead of serving any good purpose, serve only for the gratification of the worst passions of the human heart."

SABBATH ACCIDENTS.—Several weeks ago there happened two or three railroad accidents on a Sunday, between Albany and Buffalo, and the circumstance furnished a text for many sermons about the wickedness of traveling on Sunday. Here are a couple of items from the Albany Argus, which show that accidents sometimes happen on Saturday as well as on Sunday. Who will preach the sermons?

At noon on Saturday last, as the train was leaving the depot at Little Falls for the west, Mr. J. H. Tomlinson, of Syracuse, in attempting to get upon the train, slipped and caught his foot in one of the wheels of a car, was thrown violently to the ground, and one of his legs broken in three places below the knee, and the flesh of the leg cut open to the bone from the knee to the ancle. Before any medical aid was procured, Mr. T. was taken from the station to a house about a quarter of a mile distant, losing during this time great quantities of blood, the loss of which hastened, if it did not cause, the fatal termination of the accident. Medical aid was then procured, and Dr. Armsby of Albany went up to Little Falls, but Dr. A. found the condition of Mr. T. precluded all hope of recovery. He died about an hour after Dr. A. arrived. Mr. T. was an enterprising citizen of Syracuse, actively engaged in business, and was married to a daughter of Col. Voorhees, of Onondaga county, who, with a family of two or three children, survives him.

We regret to learn that while Mr. Geo. S. Brown, of this city, was engaged on Saturday last in painting the front of a house in State street, the ladder upon which he was standing slipped, throwing him to the ground and so severely injuring him that he died yesterday morning. Mr. Brown leaves a wife and family to mourn his loss.

THE STEAMER OREGON, which used to ply on Long Island Sound, and take the lead there in point of speed and comfort, is now running as a night boat between this city and Albany. She is fitted up in the richest style, and has every convenience for the accommodation of passengers. Those who go up the river on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday nights, or come down on the alternate nights, will not find a better boat than the Oregon, or a more gentlemanly set of officers than those who manage her.

General Intelligence.

LAST WEEK'S CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

The principal subject before the Senate was the Oregon Bill, which furnished an occasion for speeches without number on the subject of slavery. After the discussion had continued through three days of last week, a motion was passed to commit the bill and amendments to a select committee of eight, to be composed of four members from the North and four from the South, divided equally also as to party, and elected by ballot, who shall report what plan, if any, can be adopted to harmonize the views of the North and the South. This result is regarded as insuring the success of the Missouri Compromise. The committee consists of Messrs. Dickenson, Phelps, Bright, and Clark, from the Free States; and Messrs. Mason, Calhoun, Atchison, and Underwood, of the Slave States. Mr. Hale introduced in the Senate a joint resolution in favor of preventing speculation in the public lands, and providing that every male citizen owning no other land, may enter 100 acres and receive a patent for the same, after five years residence thereon. A petition was presented from Vermont, praying Congress to purchase the Mount Vernon estate for the site a National Botanic Garden; referred to the Committee on Agriculture. A petition was also presented, and referred to the Library Committee, in favor of purchasing Catlin's Indian Gallery. A bill was passed authorizing M. Vattemare to frank and receive free of postage, documents, books, letters, &c., for international exchanges.

In the House of Representatives, considerable time was spent in discussing a bill in favor of establishing branch mints in New York and Charleston, which was finally lost. A series of resolutions in favor of river and harbor improvements, was passed by the House. A bill was also passed granting reciprocal privileges to the productions of Canada and the United States, and allowing their transit through each free of import duties.

THE FOREIGN NEWS—BLOODSHED IN FRANCE.

The steamship Niagara arrived at Boston on Wednesday afternoon of last week, in less than eleven days from Liverpool. She brings news of terrible fighting in Paris from the 22d to the 27th of June. As this is the principal topic of general interest in the foreign advices, we copy a full account.

One of the bloodiest dramas the world ever witnessed, one of the most ferocious and obstinate insurrections which the ensanguined history of France has had to record from her earliest annals, has just been brought to a close in the streets of Paris, by the absolute annihilation of the revolted party, and the triumphant success of Republican arms.

The commencement of the rebellion appears to have been by a deputation of ouvriers who waited upon M. Marc at Luxembourg. He listened to their grievances, but observing that their spokesman had been active in the affair of the 15th of May, said to the men—"You are not the slaves of this man. You can state your own grievances." This expression was distorted among the workmen, that M. Marc had called them slaves, and it seems to have been the signal for the conspirators, who had organized a vast movement, to commence their operations.

On Thursday night, the 22d of June, the first barricades were raised, and the troops and the National Guards called out.

On Friday, the 23d, the insurgents possessed themselves of the right bank of the river Seine, stretching from the Foubourg St. Antoine to the river, while on the left bank they occupied all that portion called the cite, the Faubourgs St. Marcel, St. Victor, and the lower quarters of St. Jacques. The communication of the insurgents between the two banks of the river, was maintained by the possession of the Church St. Laivaic, a part of the quarter of the temple, the approaches of Notre Dame and the bridge St. Michael. By these extensive lines of operations the insurgents occupied a vast portion of the most defensible parts of the city, and actually threatened the Hotel de Ville, which if they had succeeded in taking, might have secured the final victory on their side. On Friday there were partial conflicts, but the insurgents seemed to be occupied more at fortifying their positions than in actual fighting. M. Lamartine rode with the staff of Cavaignac through Paris to quell the insurrection, but it was evident that nothing but the power of arms could compel the insurgents to yield. The Government forces were divided into three divisions, and large masses of troops were brought to bear with artillery upon the position of the insurgents, but still Friday passed and the insurrection had evidently gathered strength.

On Saturday, the 24th, the National Assembly declared itself in permanent session, and Paris was placed in a state of siege. The Executive power was delegated absolutely to Cavaignac, and at half-past 10 the members of the Executive, too, resigned. Reports poured in every hour to the Assembly, and as the intelligence arrived of the slaughter of the National Guards, and the fall of one General after another, who was killed or wounded by the insurgents, the sensation became deep and alarming. Various proclamations were issued by Cavaignac to induce the insurgents to lay down their arms, but to no effect. On Saturday the carnage and battle on the South of the river were horrible. During the whole of Friday night, and until 3 o'clock on Saturday, the roar of the artillery and the noise of the muskets was incessant. On Saturday night at 8 o'clock the Capital was in an awful state. Fighting continued with unabated fury. Large masses of troops poured in from all the neighboring Departments, but still the insurgents, having rendered their position almost impregnable, resisted more or less effectually all the force which could be brought against them. The red flag—the banner of the Republique Democratique et Sociale, was hoisted.

On Sunday morning, at the meeting of the National Assembly, the President announced that the Government force had completely succeeded in suppressing the insurrection on the left bank of the river, after a frightful sacrifice of human life; and that Gen. Cavaignac had given the insurgents on the right bank till 10 o'clock to surrender, when, if they did not lay down their arms, he would storm their intrenchments in the Faubourg St. Antoine, where they were now driven, and put the whole to the sword. The heaviest artillery had been brought to bear upon them, and little doubt could be entertained that the insurrection could be put down. The hope thus held out of the termination of the insurrection was not, however, realized. The fighting continued the whole of Sunday, with a fearful loss of life, especially to the National Guards.

On Monday the reinforcements Gen. Lamoriciere had received from Cavaignac, enabled him to hem in the insurgents in the Eastern part of the city, and although reduced to extremities they still fought with incredible valor. It was thought on Monday morning early, that they would surrender, but again the hope thus held out, of the termination of the insurrection, was not immediately realized. At half past 10 o'clock the fighting was resumed, and it was only after a frightful struggle of two more hours that the Government troops, everywhere, prevailed, and the pact of the insurrection being broken, the insurgents were either shot, taken prisoners, or fled into the country in the direction of Vincennes. The last band took refuge in the celebrated cemetery of Pere la Chaise, but the Garde Mobile hunted them even from this sanctuary, and they were slaughtered in the neighboring fields.

On Tuesday the insurrection was definitely quelled.

The loss of life has been terrible—no fewer than fourteen general officers had been killed; a greater loss than in the most splendid engagements of Napoleon. Among those who fell are Gens. Megrier, Deart, and Brea; Gens. Charcolnel, and Renault, and others severely wounded. Four or five members of the National Assembly are among the killed, and as many more wounded. But the most touching death is that of the Archbishop of Paris. The venerable prelate on Sunday volunteered to go to the insurgents as a Messenger of Peace. Gen. Cavaignac said that such a step was full of danger, but this Christian pastor persisted. He advanced, attended by his two Vicars, towards the barricades, with an olive branch borne before him, when he was ruthlessly shot in the groin and fell mortally wounded. The venerable patient was ordered by the insurgents to the nearest hospital in St. Antoine, where he received the last sacraments, languished and has since died. The editor of the Pere Duchesne, M. Laroche, was shot in the head at the barricade Rochechoart, where in the dress of an ouvrier he was fighting at the head of a party of insurgents. It will probably be never correctly ascertained to what extent the sacrifice of human life in this frightful struggle has reached. The estimates of killed and wounded vary materially. Some accounts give 35,000 as the total on both sides, while others give only 10,000. The number will, we have no doubt, exceed 15,000. Only 40,000 insurgents, it now appears, were engaged in the struggle.

The extent of organization which the execution of such a plan, extending over a line of several miles in length, and maintained for the last four days, disclosed, is perfectly inconceivable. Every species of artifice was employed to convey communication. The pails of the milk-women, the couches of the wounded, and even the coffins of the dead, were found filled with gunpowder and cartouches. Large sums of money in gold and notes, were discovered on the persons of men apparently in extreme poverty and young children. The women of Paris took a most active part in the struggle. They conveyed orders and signals through the hottest fire. They carried off the wounded; some of them perished in the barricades or fired from the houses on the soldiers; while some of them are reported to have inflicted the most refined barbarities upon their wretched fellow citizens who had fallen prisoners into their hands. None were spared by the chance or the indiscriminating fury of this general slaughter. So vast and horrible a desolation wrought in the heart of a city by the hands of her own citizens the world has not witnessed in the whole survey of historic memory; and the arms of a stranger and an enemy would have been devoted to eternal infamy if they had inflicted so awful a chastisement on the great city of Paris. None but herself could punish her iniquities or inflict her doom.

General European Intelligence.

From Italy, we learn that the Vicenza has been retaken by the Italians; that Padau has capitulated to the Austrians; that Trieste has been placed in a state of blockade, and that the Lombard army has been defeated near Verona.

A formidable Carlist movement has been commenced in Spain.

It is rumored that the Austrian army has been ordered to invade Prussia. There is little doubt that an immense army is on the march for Poland.

There is a prospect for the speedy termination of the German war and the establishment of peace. The draft of a new Constitution has been prepared, and is likely to be approved of.

In Greece, the rebellious disposition of a great portion of the people has been completely subdued.

The Danes still continue to make reprisals at sea on Prussia. Late accounts justify the hope of a settlement of existing differences.

In Ireland the armed movement goes on unabated. Thousands are weekly flocking to the clubs, and Government appears to be unable to devise a check.

CONVERSION FROM ROMANISM.—In a letter from Mexico, written by the Rev. G. G. Goss to the S. W. Baptist Chronicle, we find the following items:—

A priest called upon the Rev. Mr. McCarty and myself the other day, and declared himself in favor of Protestantism, and signified his determination to renounce Catholicism, and join some Protestant church. He seems to be a man of good intelligence; and, like most of the priests, is wealthy. This corrupt system of Catholicism must soon fall; it never can stand before the light of the Bible, or the influence of civilization. I also learn that another priest has just been condemned to be hung, for aiding soldiers to desert; but if peace is soon made, he may be saved by a pardon.

SUMMARY.

The Yorkville (S. C.) Messenger, of July 1, says:—"From a source on which we can fully rely, we learn that Gov. Johnson recently had a negro house burnt, and what is almost incredible, twenty negro children out of twenty-eight in the building were consumed with it. It is said that the children were removed to this building and placed under the care of several negro women for better care and protection; when the house taking fire from some accident during the night, the calamity occurred. One woman was saved by leaping from the window of the second story."

A letter announces the decease of a distinguished matron, a relict of the era of the Revolution, in the person of Mrs. Julia Rush, widow of the distinguished Dr. Benjamin Rush, and mother of the Hon. Richard Rush, now minister of the United States to France. She died on Friday night, in the ninetieth year of her age, at Sydenham near Philadelphia, (the residence of her son.) She was sister of the late Hon. Richard Stockton, of New Jersey, and grandmother of Com. R. F. Stockton, U. S. Navy.

A fearful and thrilling scene occurred at the suspension bridge, at Niagara Falls, on the 10th inst. Four men were passing over the bridge, when it was struck by one of those sudden and strong gusts of wind which frequently rush through the chasm with the tremendous force of a hurricane, and so twisted it as to turn it bottom upward. The men caught in the wires, and in this position, suspended 200 feet above the resistless waters beneath—they were enabled to maintain themselves until the alarm was given at the Falls, a mile and a half distant, and the whole population in a body rushed to the rescue. The bridge was restored to its former position, and the men saved.

The trial of Drayton, Sayres, and English, charged with aiding the attempted escape of seventy-six slaves from Washington City last winter, is set down for the 28th inst. District Attorney Key has drawn three hundred and thirty indictments against them, which, it is estimated, will draw from the U. S. Treasury and place in his pocket the snug little sum of $3,300. For the defense Gov. Seward, Hon. Horace Mann, and several other eminent citizens have been engaged—all, we believe, serving without fee or reward.

The Paris National states that, from all quarters, the most satisfactory accounts are received of the state and prospects of the harvest in France. All the journals of the interior repeat, that the "oldest inhabitants" cannot remember a season so favorable to the fruits of the earth. The corn is strong and well advanced. The vines are covered with grapes and flowers. The grains are abundant, and already in many parts of the country it has been necessary to mow the artificial prairies where the luzerne, the sain-foin and clover begin to suffer from excess of vegetation.

The Newark Herald states, that Mr. John Daggett, of that place, has invented an improved carding-machine, which is to perform four times the work done by any other double carding-machine in use. The machinery is so arranged that it will card the wool and produce four rolls as easily and as quickly as a common machine produces one. It requires one more power for its motion than that used to impel an ordinary machine, but does not take up as much room upon the floor.

A very interesting patent case was recently decided in the U. S. Circuit Court at Boston, before Justice Sprague. Chester Gorham was complainant against William Mixter, for the violation of a patent granted for a machine for pressing palm leaf hats. The case occupied the Court for several days. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff and damages to the amount of $1,000.

A most singular instance of terror is recorded in the Journal de Medicine, Salt-petriere. A female of advanced age was so affected with horror on hearing that her daughter, with two children in her arms, had precipitated herself out of a window, and were killed on the spot, that her skin, in a single night, from head to foot, became as black as that of a negro. The same passion turns the hair white, of which many instances are now on record.

We learn from Harrisonville, that a man by the name of Ison, a resident of Van Buren County, in the early part of last week, was found dead in his door-yard, and his wife a corpse near him. Both were shot, and it is supposed that he first killed his wife, and then put an end to his own existence with the same gun.

A most destructive hurricane passed over Orange County, Ind., a few days since, which swept almost everything before it. The current was from one to two miles wide. A number of houses were blown down. A great deal of stock was destroyed, orchards uprooted, forests leveled, and the injury to the growing crops was immense.

Jason Mauly, of Seaville, Me., was found dead in his bed some days since. The Coroner's Jury returned a verdict that he committed suicide by firing a loaded musket into his mouth. A subsequent examination was held, when a new verdict was rendered, that some person or persons unknown had fired the fatal musket.

The Cincinnati papers state that some two hundred Michigan Volunteers reached that city on the 4th, on their way from the war, in a most pitiable condition. Four of them died between Louisville and that city, and another soon after being placed on a canal-boat.

FANNY FORRESTER'S BIRD.

We mentioned the other day, that a paragraph in the Maulmain Free Press announced that a daughter had been born to Mrs. Judson, of the mission at Maulmain, formerly well known under her nom de plume of Fanny Forrester. We are glad to have more decided confirmation of the fact from the lady's own testimony, which is not so metaphorical that there will be any question of its signification. The lines which follow, and which bear date, Maulmain, January, 1848, (Fanny is at the autipodes, you must remember,) are from the June number of the Columbian Magazine, where they appear under the title of 'My Bird.' [Bos. Trans.

Ere last year's moon had left the sky,
A birdling sought my Indian nest,
And folded, oh, so lovingly!
Her tiny wings upon my breast.

From morn till evening's purple tinge,
In winsome helplessness she lies,
Two rose leaves, with a silken fringe,
Shut softly on her starry eyes.

There's not in Ind a lovelier bird;
Broad earth owns not a happier nest;
O, God, thou hast a fountain stirred,
Whose waters never more shall rest!

This beautiful, mysterious thing,
This seeming visitant from heaven,
This bird with the immortal wing,
To me—to me, Thy hand has given.

The pulse first caught its tiny stroke,
The blood its crimson hue, from mine;
This life, which I have dared invoke,
Henceforth is parallel with Thine.

A silent awe is in my room—
I tremble with delicious fear;
The future, with its light and gloom,
Time and Eternity are here.

Doubts—hopes, in eager tumult rise;
Hear, O, my God! one earnest prayer:
Room for my bird in Paradise,
And give her angel plumage there!

THE INDIAN CHIEF.

The following beautiful story is literally true, and was first published in a lecture delivered by William Tracy, Esq., of Utica, N. Y., on the early history of Oneida County. It has been altered by somebody, but we have not the means at hand of correcting the alterations, nor are they sufficiently important to mar the beauty of the incident as gracefully related by Mr. Tracy, whose fine pen, we take this occasion to say, it is a reproach to him, that he has suffered to lie idle so long.

One of the first settlers in Western New York was Judge W——, who established himself at Whitestown—about four miles from Utica. He brought his family with him, among whom was a widowed daughter with an only child—a fine boy about four years old. You will recollect, the country around was an unbroken forest, and this was the domain of the savage tribes.

Judge W—— saw the necessity of keeping on good terms with the Indians, for as he was alone, he was completely at their mercy. Accordingly he took every opportunity to assure them of his kindly feelings, and to secure their good will in return. Several of the chiefs came to see him, and all appeared pacific. But there was one thing that troubled him; an aged chief of the Oneida tribe, and one of great influence, who resided at the distance of a dozen miles, had not yet been to see him, nor could he ascertain the views and feelings of the sachem, in respect to his settlement in that region. At last he sent him a message, and the answer was that the chief would visit him on the morrow.

True to his appointment, the sachem came; Judge W—— received him with marks of respect, and introduced his wife, his daughter, and little boy. The interview that followed was interesting. Upon its results, the Judge was convinced his security might depend, and he was therefore exceedingly anxious of making a favorable impression upon the distinguished chief. He expressed his desire to settle in the country, to live on terms of amity and good fellowship with the Indians, and to be useful to them by introducing among them the arts of civilization.

The chief heard him out, and then said:—"Brother, you ask much, and you promise much. What pledge can you give of your faith? The white man's word may be good to the white man, yet it is wind when spoken to the Indian."

"I have put my life in your hands," said the Judge, "is not that an evidence of my good intention? I have placed confidence in the Indian, and will not believe that he will abuse and betray the trust that is thus reposed."

"So much is well," replied the chief, "the Indian will repay confidence with confidence; if you will trust, he will trust you. Let the boy go with me to my wigwam—I will bring him back in three days with my answer!"

If an arrow had pierced the bosom of the mother, she could not have felt a deeper pang than went to her heart, as the Indian made this proposal. She sprang forward, and ran to the boy, who stood at the side of the Sachem; looking into his face with pleased wonder and admiration, she encircled him in her arms, and pressing him to her bosom, was about to fly from the room. A gloomy and ominous frown came over the sachem's brow, but he did not speak.

But not so with Judge W——. He knew that the success of their enterprise, the lives of his family, depended on the decision of a moment.

"Stay, stay, my daughter," he said, "bring back the boy, I beseech you. He is not more to you than to me. I would not risk a hair of his head. But, my child, he must go with the Chief. God will watch over him! He will be as safe in the Sachem's wigwam, as beneath our own roof."

The agonized mother hesitated for a moment; she then slowly returned, placed the boy on the knee of the Chief, and kneeling at his feet, burst into a flood of tears. The gloom passed from the Sachem's brow, but he said not a word. He arose and departed.

I shall not attempt to describe the agony of the mother for the ensuing days. She was agitated by contending hopes and fears. In the night she awoke from her sleep, seeming to hear the screams of her child, calling on its mother for help. But the time slowly wore away—and the third day came. How slowly did the hours pass. The morning waned away, noon arrived; yet the Sachem came not. There was a gloom over the whole household. The mother was pale and silent. Judge W—— walked the floor to and fro, going every few minutes to the door, and looking through the opening in the forest towards the Sachem's abode.

At last as the rays of the setting sun were thrown on the tops of the trees around, the eagle feathers of the Chief were seen dancing above the bushes in the distance. He advanced rapidly—and the little boy was at his side. He was gaily attired as a young chief—his feet being dressed in mocasins, a fine beaver skin on his shoulders, and eagle feathers were stuck in his hair. He was in excellent spirits, and so proud was he of his honors, that he seemed two inches taller than he was before. He was soon in his mother's arms, and in that brief minute he seemed to passed from death to life. It was a happy meeting—too happy for me to describe.

"The white man has conquered!" said the Sachem; "hereafter let us be friends. You have trusted an Indian; he will repay you with confidence and friendship."

He was as good as his word; and Judge W—— lived for many years in peace with the Indian tribes, and succeeded in laying the foundation of a flourishing and prosperous community.

THE TOWN OF SINGAPORE.

From the anchorage, the town of Singapore has a very pleasant appearance. Most of the public buildings, as well as some of the principal merchant's houses, face the sea. The church is also close to the beach, to allow the congregation the benefit of the sea breezes. It has no architectural beauty to recommend it, being a plain building, with a spiral steeple, surmounted by a cross. The interior is fitted up with more regard to neatness than elegance. It has an organ, and is supplied with a host of young choristers. Between the beach and Government Hill is a delightful upland, which is generally attended by all the beauty and fashion of Singapore in the cool of the evening. A canal or small river divides the town in two parts. On the western side of it, stand all the stone houses of the merchants, and it is here that all commercial business is transacted. It is densely populated with Armenians, Jews, Chinese, and people from every part of India; each nation residing in its own quarter, in the houses peculiar to and characteristic of their country. Indeed, one of the first things that strikes the stranger in Singapore is the variety of costume. Chinamen, Malays, Indians, Armenians, and Jews, all mingle together in every variety of picturesque costume, giving you an idea of a carnival. The palanquins resemble an omnibus on a small scale; they are drawn on four wheels, have a door on either side, and seats for four people. They are very high, and drawn by one horse. The conductors, however, are not perched up on high, but run by the side of the horse, as do all the Syces in India. There are two hotels, the proprietors of which are of course rivals. One is kept by an Englishman, the other by a Frenchman; both are equally attentive, but the Frenchman's house has the preference, in consequence of its superior locality, facing the esplanade and looking upon the sea. The governor's house is situated on the summit, about a quarter of a mile from the beach. From it you have a bird's eye view of the whole town, and also of the whole country in the interior for some distance. From this eminence the town has a very picturesque appearance; the houses on the east side of the river (the May Fair of Singapore) are built apart, and surrounded by pretty gardens, and lawns; beyond this you have the roads and the sea studded with every variety of vessels, and the Island of Blinting rises from sea in the distance. The interior is not without beauty; the eye ranges over a vast expanse of grove and forest, interspersed with plantations of nutmegs, cinnamon, cloves, and sugar canes, and from which a most delightful perfume is brought by the breeze, while here and there white houses may be perceived, looking like mere spots in the dark foliage by which they are surrounded. It is surprising, when we reflect how short a space of time has passed since this settlement was first made, how such a mass of building, and such a concourse of people, can have been collected. [F. Marryatt.

SHOOTING OF AN ELEPHANT.

On a recent day, a painful feeling was excited in Liverpool by a report that the stupendous elephant Rajah, at the Zoological Gardens, had again destroyed his keeper. The facts were ascertained to be as follows:

About 10 o'clock, Richard Howard, the keeper, was in the den with Rajah. One of the holiday visitors from some of the neighboring towns was in the house watching the maneuvers of the animals, who, having in some way or other displeased his keeper, was struck by him. Rajah resented the blow, struck the man to the ground, and crushing him with one of his feet, broke almost every rib in his body. The stranger immediately gave the alarm, but it was too late—poor Howard had ceased to live. It was instantly determined that the animal should be destroyed. Mr. J. Atkins waited upon the Mayor, and received from him an introduction to the commanding officer of the district, who, at the request of Mr. A., immediately dispatched a company of Rifles from the barracks for the purpose of destroying the elephant. In the mean time several medical men had been consulted, including Dr. O'Donnell, and Messrs. Owen and Cooper, surgeons, with the view of administering poison to the animal. Two ounces of prussic acid and 25 grains of aconite (monk's hood,) were administered in buns and treacle. For a few minutes Rajah betrayed symptoms of sickness, but no other effect was visible, and he appeared soon after to recover his usual health and activity. After the lapse of three quarters of an hour, it was deemed advisable to dispatch him by shooting him. The house was ordered to be cleared of all save the soldiers, twelve of whom presented arms. Rajah turned round when he saw the rifles presented at him, but on again presenting a fair view for a shot the pieces were discharged, and he reeled, uttering at the same time a loud growl. Twelve other soldiers immediately took the place of those who had fired, and, presenting their pieces, fired at the first fair opportunity. This brought the animal to the ground. Another body of soldiers entered the house, but it was found a vital place had been touched, and one of the most magnificent elephants in Europe, whose docility and intelligence had been the theme of admiration, was dead. He had been for about a dozen years in the possession of Mr. Atkins, who paid £800 for him when but very young, and his value at the time he was shot must have considerably exceeded £1,000. An inquest was held on the body of Howard on Tuesday, when it appeared that the deceased had ill-treated the animal, and on the morning of its death had struck it a savage blow on one of the tusks. After it had killed the keeper, the elephant ate the broom, as well as the stick, but was perfectly quiet.

RAISING QUINCES.

A correspondent of the Horticulturist, who raises this fruit of extraordinary excellence, pursues the following course:—He selects good, deep, dry, rich soil; which is deepened by a thorough use of the subsoil plough, and manure applied copiously and deeply, by dropping it in the bottom of each furrow as the plough proceeds. Large and deep holes are dug for the trees; each receives half a barrel of good compost; the branches are shortened one half, before setting; and the soil is well settled among the roots by drenching with water, before the hole is quite filled. All fruit trees, by the way, should receive this good treatment. He does not lose one tree in a hundred by this excellent practice.

The pruning is given in autumn, and consists of cutting out, as sparingly as possible, and only old, crooked, crowded, and decayed branches. Every autumn, manure is spread round each tree, and after a light ploughing in spring, salt is spread broadcast at the rate of ten bushels per acre. The salt is regarded as of very great consequence, but it must be applied in connexion with free manuring every year. The ground is kept mellow and clear by constant cultivation, potatoes, sugar-beets, &c., being found well adapted to the purpose. The principal secret of success, it will thus be perceived, consists in cultivating and doing everything in the best manner; while others who do not succeed, do not cultivate their trees at all.

The writer states that a good crop of quinces may be obtained three years after transplanting, and the trees will continue in a productive state thirty years.

NIAGARA—THE WIRE BRIDGE.

Niagara Falls!—The same wonder of wonders! Rolling, whirling, trembling, thundering as ever. This is about the twentieth time I have stood awe-struck and confounded in view of this tremendous cascade of roaring waters! But my feelings of profound admiration and wonder, instead of decreasing by familiarity with these sublime scenes, only deepen and widen upon every new approach. There is now, however, a new attraction at the Falls—the Suspension Bridge. This magnificent work of art will appear the more grand, from its proximity to the greatest of nature's wonderments—Niagara Falls, and the terrible gulf below! The bridge will be 230 feet above the water, and will measure 800 feet in length. It will be 28 feet wide, will have one track for the cars, two side-walks, and two roads for carriages. There are two towers of solid stone, one on each bank, 68 feet in height and 14 feet square at the bottom. From the tower sixteen cables will be suspended, each cable made of 600 No. 10 wires, firmly secured at each end in solid rock. The bridge will be capable, when done, of sustaining 200 tons in the centre. The estimated cost is not far from $180,000. The work is now slowly progressing. A kite was let loose, which took across the immense gulf a small cord; to this was fastened a small rope, to this a cable, and thus were the cables drawn across and secured. To one of these cables there is now suspended a small car, which carries over from one to six passengers, and runs backward and forward several times during the day. They run over in from three to five minutes, and charge the very moderate sum of one dollar over and one dollar back! I saw one or two pass over and back while standing on the bank. When over the centre of the yawning gulf, the man in his little car appeared about the size of a little bird suspended in mid heaven. Wonders never cease! [Chronotype.

VIANDS OF ITALY.

Roasted chestnuts are the potatoes of Italy. You see them cooked in every street; they are very good, and are brought to the tables of the great. Pumpkins as large as a man can carry, are cut up into slices, and sold for a quarter of a farthing each. They have no beef, except the miserable flesh of the white ox, worn down to a skeleton with drawing their lumbering drays. The skinned lambs and kids hang up by dozens at the butchers' doors, no bigger than cats. When brought to table in the form of chops, you may cover a single one with a half-crown piece. Fruit is cheap and delicious; grapes a penny a pound, apples and pears a farthing, and the most delightful oranges eight for a half-penny. The living at Rome is more substantial than at Naples, though the meat is scarcely better. The bread is disagreeably sour, but it may be procured at the confectioner's, made in the English way, at treble the cost. The number of small birds, sold in strings ready for the spit, chiefly larks caught in the Campagna, is extraordinary; fowls may be bought at fivepence a piece. Turkeys are very abundant; you see them driven in flocks, like sheep in England, blocking up the streets. They are a very common food amongst the lower classes, who usually buy half a turkey; and I have frequently remarked the dexterity and expedition with which the stall-keeper will split the turkey in two for the convenience of purchasers. Young wild boars, hunted in the Campagna, with porcupines from the same district, are considered great delicacies. The abundance of vegetables is quite surprising. Brocoli is a great article of food—very excellent and very cheap. All sorts are cooked in the street, whence you have them brought to your table. The natural richness of the soil is peculiarly favorable to the growth and perfection of vegetables. We had, in the month of December, green peas and asparagus for dinner. Pastry in Italy is excellent, and the water, sparkling from the fountains, is the finest in the world.

HYENA.

Dr. Sparman tells a curious story of a hyena, which was told him at the Cape of Good Hope. One night the soldiers had a feast near the Cape, when one of them, who was a trumpeter, drank so much that he could not stand up. His companions not wanting him in the room with them, carried him out of doors and laid him down by the side of the house, to get cool and sober. The trumpeter laid there, and went to sleep, when a hyena came along, and thinking him dead, began to carry him away, so as to make a meal of him without being disturbed. It was some time before the man awoke, so as to know the danger of his situation. When he did so, he found himself on the back of the hyena, who was making off towards the mountain with him as fast as possible. Being horror-struck at finding himself in the power of the ferocious beast, his fear brought him to his senses, and seizing his trumpet which hung about his neck, he sounded an alarm. The beast thinking he had only a dead man, was as much frightened at the sound of the trumpet, as the man was at his situation, so that dropping his prey, they scampered away from each other as fast as possible. It is not probable that any other man but a trumpeter would have escaped so easily.

Great Men, how Fallen!—One day some weeks ago, there were taken to the Tombs in New York, while in a state of beastly intoxication, a lawyer, who had been somewhat distinguished in his profession—a historian, the author of a standard work—an editor, once talented and of great respectability—and lastly a clergyman, a man of refined manners and highly educated. The lawyer was let off the next morning on promise of better behavior; the historian succeeded in getting his liberty to get drunk again the morning following; the editor was sent to the Alms House; and the clergyman, at the date of our information, still remained in durance. What an example this of the leveling down power of strong drink! Truly it "spares not the high nor the humble."

Check to a Scandal Hunter.—"Of course, G. and his newly-married wife live happily together?" asked an inquisitive lady of a wag. The gentleman gave a significant turn to his countenance, but said nothing. "La, you don't mean that?" pursued his interrogator. The wag gave another look of direful import, and sadly shook his head. "You don't mean to say that they quarrel?" "Worse than that, ma'am," said the wag, for the first time using his tongue. "What! does he beat her?" "Oh! far worse, she—she beats him." "Oh! my gracious," said the lady, starting back, "beats him! Well, I never." She was about to dart off with the news to a select circle of tattlers, when the wag called her back, and assuming a mock heroic tone, added: "Yes, ma'am, she beats him—but it is at chess!"

Aboriginal Industry.—By the census of the Indian tribes, which is now in procees of being taken, it is shown that the seven bands of Ottawas about Michilimackinac, numbering about 700 souls, who rely wholly on Agriculture for a subsistence, have raised during the last year, 25,000 bushels of corn, and 40,000 bushels of potatoes. They also made, the past Spring, 355,000 pounds, or over 149 tons, of maple sugar; which is worth in the Mackinac market, seven cents per pound—making $22,750 on sugar alone. Corn is worth, at the same place, 50 cents, and potatoes 37 1-2 cents per bushel. This single example shows what the Indian tribes could do for themselves, were they all to make a bold appeal to Agriculture for a living, and abandon the chase.

To Transfer Engravings to White Paper.—Place the engravings for a few seconds over iodine vapor. Dip a slip of white paper in a solution of starch, and, when dry, in a weak solution of oil of vitriol. When dry, lay the slip upon the engraving, and place them for a few minutes under a press. The engraving will thus be re-produced in all its delicacy and finish. The iodine has the property of fixing on the black parts or ink of the engraving, and not on the white. This important discovery is yet in its infancy. [The Builder.

Improved Method of Making Charcoal.—A mode of manufacturing this substance, in France, is to fill all the interstices in the heap of wood to be charred, with dry powdered charcoal; then cover the whole mass with earth or sods, and burn it the usual way. By this means, much of the access of air is prevented, and a saving of ten per cent, in volume, as well as weight, of charcoal will be gained over the ordinary modes.

How to Manage a Kicking Cow.—Take a piece of rope about two feet in length, and tie, or splice, the two ends together so as to form a loop. Double up, by bending, the fore leg of the milking side of the cow and slip the loop over her knee. By this means she will necessarily have to stand on three legs and will not be able kick.

VARIETY.

A writer in Hunt's Magazine, says, when he commenced trade in this country, many years ago, he sold English chintz for 75 cents per yard, and a servant girl received for wages 50 cents per week, and paid $4 for a dress pattern; now a girl gets from one to two dollars per week, and yet can purchase a first-rate article of a dress at eighteen cents per yard.

The negroes of the West Indies have a method of stealing rum, which involves the principles of pneumatics. They take a bottle filled with water, and invert it, placing the neck in the bung hole of the barrel so as to touch the liquor—the water being the heaviest sinks into the liquor, leaving a vacuum in the bottle, which is then filled with the liquor forced up by the atmospheric pressure.

Thirty thousand volumes are added each year to the Library of the British Museum. The books already there, are sufficient to furnish each inhabitant of London with a separate library of twenty volumes. There are one hundred thousand volumes now lying unentered; and one assistant has been engaged twelve years in making a catalogue of the maps.

A lady who had married a man of great good nature, but a little deficient in point of understanding, was reproached by her brother-in-law, who told her in derision that she had coupled herself to a fool. "So has my sister," she replied, "for no man of sense would endeavor to give a woman a mean opinion of her husband!"

Cicero the Roman orator was one day sneered at by one of his opponents, a mean man of noble lineage, on account of his low parentage. "You are the first of your line," said the railer; "and you," rejoined Cicero, "are the last of yours."

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, } Principals,
IRA SAYLES, }

Assisted in the different departments by eight able and experienced Teachers—four in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

THE Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past eight years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to continue to merit a share of public patronage. Extensive buildings are now in progress of erection, for the accommodation of students and for recitation, lecture rooms, &c. These are to be completed in time to be occupied for the ensuing fall term. They occupy an eligible position, and are to be finished in the best style of modern architecture, and the different apartments are to be heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical.

Ladies and gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board can be had in private families if particularly desired.

The plan of instruction in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the students, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The health, the morals, and the manners of our students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

Regulations.

1st. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2d. Punctuality in attending to all regular academic exercises, will be required.

3d. The use of tobacco for chewing or smoking, can not be allowed either within or about the academic buildings.

4th. Playing at games of chance, or using profane language, can not be permitted.

5th. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, can not be permitted.

6th. Gentlemen will not be allowed to visit ladies' rooms, nor ladies the rooms of gentlemen, except in cases of sickness, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

Apparatus.

The Apparatus of this Institution is sufficiently ample to illustrate successfully the fundamental principles of the different departments of Natural Science.

Notice.

The primary object of this Institution, is the qualification of School Teachers. Teachers' Classes are exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining all the facilities of a Normal School. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. The Institution has sent out not less than one hundred and fifty teachers, annually, for the three past years; a number much larger than from any other in the State.

Academic Terms.

The Academic year for 1846—7 consists of three terms, as follows:—

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 11th, 1846, and ending Thursday, November 19th, 1846.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, November 24th, 1846, and ending Thursday, March 4th, 1847.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, March 23d, 1847, and ending Thursday, July 1st, 1847.

As the classes are arranged at the commencement of the term, it is very desirable that students purposing to attend the Institution should then be present; and as the plan of instruction laid out for each class will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue till the close of the term; and, accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the term.

Expenses.

| | |
|---|---|
| Board, per week, | $1 00 |
| Room-rent, per term, | 1 50 |
| Tuition, per term, | $3 50 to 5 00 |

EXTRAS PER TERM.

The entire expense for an academic year, including board, washing, lights, fuel, and tuition, (except for the extras named above,) need not exceed seventy-five dollars.

For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

The expenses for board and tuition must be settled in advance, at the commencement of each term, either by actual payment or satisfactory arrangement.

THE FOREIGN MISSION.

The following extract from a letter of Bro. Carpenter to the Missionary Board, will be perused with interest:—

Shanghai, China, Oct. 10, 1847.

Dear Brethren,—Under the protecting care of the same kind Providence that brought us together here, we are now able to inform you that our lives are still preserved, and we have been enabled to make some progress in the attainment of this language. Our hearts are not eased of the burden which we felt at first when we saw the whole city given to idolatry. But our tongues are tied. It is a painful thought, that the majority of the multitudes we see every day will go down to the grave with all their sins upon them. We could now tell them a few plain truths, but this will not answer. They have so little idea of their depravity and of the nature of sin, that it requires something more than a stammering tongue to convince them; and if convinced by the tongue of eloquence, nothing but the Spirit of God can move them. But as the difficulties of the language will yield to patient and persevering labor, and as the Holy Spirit is promised to those who ask for it, we toil with the hope that although the root may be bitter, the fruit will be sweet.

Owing to our want of ability to speak or read this language, we can collect information but slowly. But we may describe some things as they appear to us. A few nights since we were awaked from sleep by a singular noise, which at first we could not understand. But upon opening the window, we perceived that it was the noise of gongs. All the gongs of the thousand vessels that skirt the city, and many in the city, were set to ringing in the liveliest manner. And altogether, like the voice of many waters, the sound was a most spirit-stirring one. The next day we got the explanation. The moon was eclipsed, and they were helping her out of it. They think their aid is indispensable, and as it has never failed to effect her deliverance, they unanimously rally to her relief whenever they find her in difficulty.

On the 23d ult. Bro. W. and I went in company with several others to visit the most extensive idol temple in the city. We arrived at the spot about sun-rise, and found the common people already assembled in large numbers, and earnestly engaged in their devotions. But we saw no altar to the "Unknown God." The principal temple was filled with the fumes of paper money, and of smoking incense. Many of the worshipers were actuated with the hope of gain, for by worshiping the god of wealth they hoped to derive some temporal benefit. Now we behold an infatuated mortal shaking for some time a small case partly filled with small sticks. By-and-by the lucky or unlucky one drops to the floor; this has a certain number on it; he takes it to a Touist priest, who is close by, sitting at his table, and paying him a few cash, the priest draws a card with a corresponding number, and presents it to him. Now he gets some sticks of incense, and lighting one end of the bundle he goes around and distributes them to the several gods whom he delights to honor. The gods are almost as numerous as the worshipers. While the incense is smoking before the idol, the deluded soul pays its homage to the wooden god; the body of the worshiper, obedient to the spirit that is in it, is bowed to the earth, and the head is struck several times upon the ground; he rises, and with certain indescribable motions of the hands and head, departs as stupid as he came.

But lo! suddenly all is brought to a stand!—the mandarins approach. The Mayor of the city, the highest military officer of the city, and four others, all large, dignified, hale looking men, have come in their splendid chairs, each borne by four. The crowd is divided to make way for them; mats are thrown down and splendid cushions. Presently they approach, and at the voice of a herald, the most singular sound that I ever heard, they all kneel at a distance of two or three feet from each other; at his voice they bow their gilded heads thrice upon their splendid cushions before the splendid god of the city. At the voice of the herald they simultaneously rise on their feet. At his voice they again kneel and bow down as before. Then they arise and depart, having most emphatically declared the ignorance that is in them. Then a very large rich yellow silk curtain was suspended before the idol so as to hide him from view. Before this ensign of the reigning Emperor, these worshipers came and performed the same acts as before, and then departed. After this, in the large open court in front of the temple, upon a raised platform, stood a man who, in a most singularly squeaking voice, read to the people about fifteen minutes. Thus ended the ceremony.

Brother Wardner writes as follows:—

Shanghai, China, Dec. 1, 1847.

To the Executive Board of the A. S. D. B. M. A.:

The time has come that we are permanently located on a foreign shore, surrounded by heathen and moral desolation. Feeling that the hand of Providence has directed in these matters, though aware that my place could have been more honorably and successfully filled by some other one, yet if I am occupying the place the great Head of the Church designed for me, I am willing, yea rejoice, to bid adieu to the land of my nativity, and the lovely circles that there sweetened each fleeting moment, to toil and waste my strength in a land of heathenism. The contrast is great, and calculated to awaken the keenest sensibilities of a reflecting mind, which has any sympathy for suffering humanity, or regard for the welfare of his fellows. The daily ringing of gongs and bells designed to awaken their sleepy gods, falls upon the ear of an enlightened Christian like the knell of departing souls. Could it thus salute the ears of every friend of Jesus and of the human race, I trust no dollar would corrode for want of use, nor willing herald be detained from his toil. God, angels, and devils, are gazing upon our efforts with an interest proportionate to the estimation they form of the immortal spirit, the bliss of heaven, the agonies of hell, and the duration of eternity. And who, that has one spark of a Saviour's love, can behold these things with indifference? I feel assured that my brethren do not, and that they will never abandon the cause they have so nobly undertaken. The marked manifestations of Divine favor which have attended the enterprise thus far, seem to warrant the confidence that He regards it with pleasure, and will ever crown our efforts with success, if we are prompt as faithful stewards to use the means that He has entrusted to our care. The salvation of one soul is indeed a consideration of no small moment, but are we to rest satisfied with one as long as there is any hope of another? I imagine it would not be going beyond the resources of the denomination were they to double our number within two or three years.

The committee chosen for translating the Scriptures into Chinese are yet engaged in that work. Their time, thus far, has been spent in fruitless efforts to agree upon the term for representing the Supreme Being, till at length they have determined to proceed, leaving a blank wherever that word occurs, to be supplied by each one according to his views. We arrived in China too late to have a seat with that committee, yet we hope to be privileged with an opportunity of uttering our protest against any interpolation or false rendering, if any such should occur. I entertain but little hope, however, that any thing we may say or do will avail much with them, since there appears to be so much sensitiveness in regard to our chief points of difference. Still I hope we shall not be backward in doing what we can.

We have devoted most of our time since we became settled to the acquisition of the colloquial dialect, by which means we are able to converse somewhat. For the last few weeks Br. C. and myself have devoted a portion of each day to the study of the written character, and have formed ourselves into a class with brothers Syles and Spaulding, under the supervision of Bishop Boone, and proceed upon a new and systematic plan. The farther we advance the more we see the difficulties of the language. The multitude of words having the same pronunciation, but differing in meaning, distinguishable only by a slight variation in the tone or context, render it extremely puzzling. For example, there are a hundred and thirteen words pronounced chi, and all of different signification. It is regarded as the work of a life to become an expert Chinese linguist. Hence you see men are needed here of strong natural talents and habitual application, as well as eminent piety.

The prosperity of the London mission, in this place, is truly encouraging. They have now a press in operation, which cost about £600, propelled by the strength of a bullock, and throwing off several thousand sheets per hour, by which means they are supplying the people with portions of the Scriptures and religious tracts. Colporteurs are thronged with people whose eagerness to obtain religious instruction displays their thirst for the waters of life.

We give also the following from Bro. Wardner:—

Shanghai. China, Dec. 7, 1847.

Dear Brother,—We have now become so engaged in our labors that we have less time to think of our former homes and friends, and are becoming more interested in what immediately surrounds us, and in the objects of our toil. We sometimes feel weighed down like a cart pressed with sheaves, as we behold this vast empire wholly given up to idolatry its many millions of tenants enveloped in a mist of moral darkness tenfold more dreadful than that which overshadowed Egypt, and crushed beneath the horrid bondage which satan has placed upon them. And when we consider that we are placed here as beacons for the gaze of such a multitude, to direct them to the fountain of life, standing as the representatives of our divine Redeemer, and that every word and action is to have a bearing upon their estimation of the Christian religion, we are led to exclaim, like one of old, "Who is sufficient for these things." We often become feverish with anxiety to be enabled to tell them of a Saviour's love and the worthlessness of their fancied gods. But, alas! our tongues are tied, and we are obliged to smother our feelings till by the providence of God this obstacle may be removed. The slowness of our progress again adds to our distress. We resolve upon increased exertion, until admonished by declining health that we are overtaxing our strength. Added to all these things is the introduction of principles at variance with truth, and by an overwhelming majority, to be palmed off upon these benighted souls as the solemn declarations of God, which can but distress the heart of every one who loves the truth or the souls of men. Eternity alone can unfold the awful reality of these things. Every moment of unnecessary indulgence and ease, and every cankering dollar that is withheld from the prosecution of this great work, will doubtless be reproved by the shrieks of undying souls. Could we but visit their dark abode, and hear its numberless Dives pleading for those who are yet in the land of hope, we should no doubt think less of our own worldly comfort, the applause of man, and the reproaches of the wicked. Do not suffer our brethren to rest contented with the few slender instruments that are now by divine permission in the field, if it is possible to prevent it. Let other efficient laborers be speedily sent out to join us in this arduous work. Let the Macedonian cry resound throughout the length and breadth of the denomination, "Come over and help us." Souls are dying to-day, and who is there to lead them to the fountain of life.?

Mrs. W. suffered some with ill-health (as well as Mrs. C.) during the hot season, but is now much better than when we left New York. She has been able to perform her share of the domestic duties, and keeps up with the class in the tupa most of the time; and in fact does as much as is expected of foreign ladies here, visiting excepted. I mention these things, being aware that much solicitude has been felt on her account. We find many choice friends here, and many comforts which we little expected in a heathen land. Yours with much esteem,

N. WARDNER.

LIGHTS AND SHADES.

The gloomiest day hath gleams of light,
  The darkest wave hath bright foam near it;
And twinkles through the cloudiest night
  Some solitary star to cheer it.

The gloomiest soul is not all gloom,
  The saddest heart is not all sadness,
And sweetly o'er the darkest doom
  There shines some lingering beam of gladness.

Despair is never quite despair;
  Nor life nor death, the future closes;
And round the shadowy brow of Care,
  Will Hope and Fancy twine their roses.

THE PRAYING NEGRO.

Mr. Knibb relates the following circumstances relative to David, a deacon of his church:—A few years ago, one of the slave members belonging to the Baptist church at Montego Bay, was banished from his home and sent to the estate where David lived, to be cured of his praying. By the pious conversation of this exiled Christian negro, David was brought under serious concern for his soul, which ended in his conversion to God. David spoke to his fellow slaves about Jesus, and his love in dying for poor sinners. God, who despises not the humblest instruments, blessed the efforts of this poor negro, and, in a short time, about thirty on the estate began to pray, and at length built a small hut, in which, after the labors of the day, they might assemble and worship God. Tidings of these things reached the ears of the white persons employed on the estate, and David was summoned before his attorney, and asked whether he was teaching the slaves to pray. On replying in the affirmative, the hut was demolished and burnt, and David was stretched upon the ground, and flogged with the cart-whip till his flesh was covered with blood. Next Sunday I missed my faithful deacon at the house of God. His afflicted wife came and told me the sad tale of his sufferings, and informed me that his hands were bound, and his feet made fast in the stocks. Often did I inquire after him, and for him, and the same answer was returned, "Massa, him in the stocks;" till one morning, as I sat in my piazza, he appeared before the window. There he stood—I have his image now before me—he was handcuffed, barefoot, unable to wear his clothes from his yet unhealed back; his wife had fastened some of her garments round his lacerated body. I call him in, and said,

"David, David, what have you done?"

With a look of resignation I shall never forget, he replied,

"Don't ask me; ask him that bring me, massa."

Turning to the negro who had him in charge, I said,

"Well, what has this poor man done?"

"Him pray, massa," was the reply; "and buckra send him to the work-house for punishment."

I gave him some refreshment, (for in the state I have described he had walked thirteen miles under a burning sun,) and followed him to the work-house. He was chained to a fellow-slave by the neck, and sent to work on the public roads. The next day I went to visit him again, when I was informed by the supervisor of the work-house, that he had received orders to have him flogged again, as soon as his back was well enough to bear it. In these chains David remained for months; frequently I saw him, but never did I hear one murmur or one complaint, except when he heard that the partner of his joys and sorrows was ill on the estate, and he was forbidden to go and see her.

At the end of three months he was liberated, and, returning to the estate, was asked,

"Now, sir, will you pray again?"

"Massa," said the persecuted disciple, "you know me is a good slave; but, if trouble come for dis, me must pray, and me must teach me broder to pray too."

Again he was immured in a dungeon and his feet made fast in the stocks.

THE TWO OFFICERS.

An officer in the British service, whose wit and wickedness had rendered him the chief attraction of the circle in which he moved, on his conversion, determined to seclude himself as far as possible from the company of his old associates. Among them there was one with whom he had long enjoyed an intimate and unbroken friendship. He called on that individual to announce the change he had recently undergone, and to assure him, that if for the future their intimacy must cease, it was from no feeling of disrespect, but simply from an alteration in his religious views; at the same time intimating how delightful it would be for both, should they ever renew their friendship in mutual faith and hope. The friend listened with mingled astonishment and pity to what he considered the ravings of a harmless maniac; and after assuring him that, so far as he was concerned, these new notions would never meet with any ungentlemanly opposition, gave him to understand that the future renewal of their acquaintance in consequence of a similar change in him, was not only unlikely, but forever improbable.

In the course of a long conversation, the converted officer found himself unable to produce the slightest impression; and at length he rose to take his leave. In doing so, he ventured to suggest, that, as they had spent so many happy hours together when their tastes and feelings were quite congenial, and should wish this final interview to be marked by something on which both might be able to reflect with pleasure in future days, it would be his last request, and surely so tried and steady a friend would not refuse to oblige him.

His proposal was prayer. Accordingly, they knelt together; the one, as he afterwards told me, reluctantly submitting to what he conceived a most whimsical request, the other most anxiously desiring the conversion of a friend whom his former example had contributed to ruin. That prayer seemed as if it would take no denial; and while it was ascending, the answer came. The trifler was subdued upon the spot; and the petitions presented on his behalf were so graciously fulfilled, that the meeting which was intended as a final interview, proved the commencement of a friendship enduring as eternity.

SAMSON'S DEATH.

The time at last came when the daughters of the Philistines did rejoice, and the daughters of the uncircumcised triumphed. Both with his first and second wife Samson showed himself peculiarly alive to the force of female importunities, and apt to give way before the exhibition of female distress. In the former attempt to extort a secret from him, it is said that his wife lay sore upon him; in the present attempt, that his soul was vexed unto death. It looks a marvelous infatuation, the effect of melancholy weakness, that he should have been thus got the better of in the face of the former palpable designs to give him up unto the Philistines, evincing the blindness of passion, and holding forth a most impressive lesson to beware of it. The secret came out at last. God had charged his mother before that he was born, that no razor should come upon his head, making this the condition, whether of the strength which he had naturally, or of the extraordinary visitations and gifts which he received of supernatural strength, when the Spirit of God came upon him. He gave up his conscience and his vow to a perfidious woman, who, on his locks being shorn off, began to afflict him, a process which I cannot distinctly understand. At all events his strength did depart from him, and he, when he awoke out of his sleep, was unconscious thereof; but the Philistines, in obedience to the call of his treacherous and cruel wife, were upon him, and the Philistines prevailed. And merciless was the advantage they took of their success; putting out his eyes, and binding him with fetters, and forcing him to grind in a prison house. I know not if there be any natural connection between the growth of the hair and the recovery of strength. Samson may have repented of his infidelity, and the temporal chastisement of his loss of strength been withdrawn. And this strength was made the instrument at the last of a great and signal manifestation, a triumph over idolatry, a vindication of the supremacy of the one only and true God, and, finally, a most picturesque and characteristic termination to the career of a great hero. One recoils from the barbarity of the Philistines in bringing in blind old Samson to make sport of him; and, proportionally to this, one feels a certain wild and natural satisfaction in the average ruin which he brought upon his enemies, even though himself involved in the common destruction that fell upon all, both men and women, who were enjoying the savage spectacle. Thus fell one of the most noted of the historical personages whom Scripture, so full of them, has transmitted downward to future ages. [Chalmers.

HOW THE FIRST CHRISTIANS LIVED.

An approved writer, in describing the religious character of the primitive Christians, observes, that "when they gave themselves to Christ, the surrender was an honest, whole-hearted transaction, never to be reconsidered, never to be regretted."

Hence, from the hour of their conversion, they made little account of property. If it was confiscated by government, or destroyed by the mob, they "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods," assured that in heaven they had a better, an incorruptible inheritance. When the case required, how ready were they to lay all at the feet of the missionary. Generally, they were poor. A rich Christian! why, such a thing was hardly known. However it may be now, it was then "easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." And if, as an act of special sovereignty, a man of wealth was converted, he seldom retained his riches for a long period; for such was his sympathy for the despoiled and suffering brotherhood, and such his solicitude for the conversion of the perishing, that his funds were poured forth as water. Yet, poor as were the first Christians, they were liberal to a degree seldom surpassed. We from our much give little. They from their little gave much. Their "deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality." Baptized covetousness was the product of a later age.

They understood Christ to be in earnest, when, standing but one step from the throne of the universe, he said, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." It was not therefore with them a matter to be considered, whether they should go or not go. The command was positive and peremptory, and how could they escape from the obligation? With us, to stay is the rule, to go is the exception. With them, to go was the rule, to stay was the exception. Wonder not why they accomplished so much; wonder not we accomplish so little. They did not wait indolently for openings, but went forth either to find them or make them. If defeated at one point, instead of returning to Jerusalem in despondency, and writing a book on the impracticability of Christian missions, they proceeded to another perhaps more distant field, and then to another, and still another, until they had gone over the appointed territory.

CALVIN AND ECKIUS.

Eckius being sent by the Pope, legate into France, upon his return took Geneva in his way, on purpose to see Calvin; and if occasion presented, to attempt reducing him to the Romish church. Eckius went privately to Calvin's house, and introduced himself as a stranger who had heard much of his fame, and was come to wait upon him. Calvin invited him to come in, and he entered the house with him; where, discoursing of many things concerning religion, Eckius perceived Calvin to be an ingenious and learned man, and desired to know if he had not a garden to walk in. To which Calvin replying he had, they both went into it; and there Eckius began to inquire of him, why he left the Roman church, and offered some arguments to persuade him to return; but Calvin could by no means be inclined to think of it. At last Eckius told him that he would put his life in his hands; and then said, he was Eckius the Pope's legate. At this discovery Calvin was not a little surprised, and begged his pardon that he had not treated him with that respect which was due to his quality. Eckius returned the compliment, and told him if he would come back to the Roman church, he would certainly procure for him a Cardinal's cap. But Calvin was not to be moved by such an offer. Eckius then asked him what revenue he had. He told the Cardinal he had that house and garden, and fifty livres per annum, besides an annual present of some wine and corn; on which he lived very contentedly. Eckius told him that a man of his parts deserved a greater revenue; and then renewed his invitation to come over to the Romish church, promising him a better stipend if he would. But Calvin, giving him thanks, assured him he was well satisfied with his condition.

Eckius accepted Calvin's invitation to dine with him; and after dinner, at the request of Eckius, they visited the church which anciently was the cathedral. On their way Eckius pressed upon Calvin the present of a hundred pistoles to buy him books and to express his respect for him. But as they were coming out of the church, Calvin stopped him a little, and having explained to the persons who accompanied them how he had been presented by the stranger with a purse of gold, he said he would give it to the poor, and so deposited it in the poor-box that was kept there! Eckius was now convinced that all efforts to secure the apostacy of Calvin would be in vain, and made no further attempt. [Religious Anecdotes.

QUESTIONS WELL ANSWERED.

A conceited fellow wished to puzzle Thales, the Miletian, one of the wise men of Greece, and proposed to him, in rapid succession, the following difficult questions. The philosopher replied to them all without the least hesitation, and with how much propriety and decision our readers can judge for themselves:—

"What is the oldest of things?"

"God, because he always existed."

"What is the most beautiful?"

"The world, because it is the work of God."

"What is the greatest of all things?"

"Space, because it contains all that is created."

"What is the quickest of all things?"

"Thought, because in a moment it can fly to the end of the universe."

"What is the strongest?"

"Necessity, because it makes men face all the dangers of life."

"What is the most difficult?"

"To know yourself."

"What is the most constant of all things?"

"Hope, because it still remains with man after he has lost everything else."

JUDGE BELL ON THE PENNSYLVANIA CASE.

Two weeks ago we printed the Opinion of Judge Bell in relation to the constitutionality of that Act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania which imposes fines and penalties for working on "the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday." Our readers have doubtless made themselves familiar with the document, and discovered that it is in many respects defective. The Judge takes for granted several things vital to the decision of the question at issue; and of course his conclusion, though it may be perfectly consistent with his premises and argument, fails to meet the case in hand. The question raised was, whether a law enforcing by fines and imprisonment a cessation from labor on the first day of the week, conflicts with this provision of the Constitution: "No human authority can in any case whatever control or interfere with the rights of conscience, and no preference shall be given by law to any religious establishment or modes of worship." Judge Bell says it does not, and in order to sustain this opinion he assumes certain positions which we think cannot be maintained.

In the outset, he assumes that the observance of the first day of the week is simply a civil regulation, and therefore does not exalt the religious belief of one sect over that of another. But does he suppose that the law was passed, or that ever a law could be passed requiring the observance of the first day, upon civil considerations alone, without any regard to the religious character of the day? We think not. Indeed, he admits, that "it may have been a motive with the law-makers to prohibit the profanation of a day regarded by them as sacred," and he even goes so far as to say, that "there are expressions used in the statute that JUSTIFY this conclusion." But if it was a motive with the law-makers to prohibit the profanation of a day regarded by them as sacred, upon what reasonable ground can it be denied that the law exalts their religious belief above that of those who deny the sacredness of the first day? We confess we are not lawyer enough to see.

The assumption, that the observance of the first day is simply a civil regulation, prepares the way for another assumption, which some may question, namely, that to be productive of the required advantage it is "absolutely necessary" for periods of rest to recur, not only at stated intervals, but at the same time for all the people. It is no doubt very desirable to have uniformity in this matter, but that it is absolutely necessary—so necessary as to justify compulsory laws against conscientious men—we deny. The Friends or Quakers differ somewhat from the mass of people in regard to their resting time, devoting to that purpose a part of two days each week, instead of the whole of one, and yet we think it would be difficult to prove, on civil grounds alone, that they do not derive as much advantage from their seasons of relaxation as those who maintain a different practice. The Jews also observe a different day of the week from most of their neighbors, but we believe it is generally conceded, that the State has about as little trouble from them as from any other class of citizens. As to the Seventh-day Baptists, those who differ from them entirely in religious views have often testified to their general uprightness and law-abiding character, whenever the question of granting them civil protection has come before the Legislatures of the various States. From such facts as these we think the conclusion is very natural, that however desirable it may be to have uniformity in respect to the day of relaxation throughout the country, still such uniformity is not "indispensably necessary" to the existence and well-being of society.

Judge Bell tells us, that for the Legislature to assert the sanctity of the first day, is not unconstitutional, "unless in this the religious conscience of others has been offended, and their rights invaded"—which, he assumes, cannot be fairly maintained in this case. But here we beg leave to differ from him entirely, believing that the religious conscience of the Sabbath-keeper is offended, and that his rights are invaded, by a law asserting the sanctity of the first day. His conscience is offended, because the law declares that to be a sacred day which he believes to be a common working day, and compels him in some degree to practice accordingly, by resting from his labor on the first day, when he feels, in view of the law of God and the claims of those dependent upon him, that he ought to be at work. His rights are invaded, because the law, by compelling him to rest from labor on Sunday, takes from him one-sixth part of his working time—thus imposing a tax upon him in comparison with which the church-rates of a religious establishment ought not to be named. It is a mere assumption, therefore, and contrary to truth, that the religious conscience of Sabbath-keepers is not offended, neither their rights invaded, by the Sunday laws of Pennsylvania.

The constitutionality of the law in question was opposed by the counsel of the German Sabbath-keepers, on the ground that his clients felt bound in conscience to attend to their business on the first six days of the week, as well as to rest on the seventh day. Judge Bell admits, that if this were so, the law which compels them to inaction on one of the six days may well be regarded as an invasion of their conscientious convictions. But this argument he takes the liberty of setting aside, because he thinks the fourth commandment designed to designate a weekly day of rest, but not to fix the days for work. Still we believe that in a modified form the position taken by the counsel is a sound and sustainable one. The command is, "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." Though the primary object was to designate a rest-day, a secondary object may have been to indicate the general duty of men to attend to some useful calling on the other six days. Certainly it looks so much that way, that we think a Legislature treading on dangerous ground to enact that men should not work but five days in a week, which is the practical effect of the law under consideration. Whether the Judge was at liberty to deny the claim of conscientiousness set up for the Germans, is a question about which there is, to say the least of it, room for difference of opinion.

—It is not easy to foresee the consequences of the Supreme Court's decision, although we think there is no difficulty in deciding that they will be generally bad. True Sabbath-keepers will not of course expect any good to come from a decision which exposes them, a class of confessedly conscientious men, to fines and imprisonment for acting according to the dictates of conscience. Strict and intelligent observers of the first day will not expect their views of truth to be advanced by a decision that the first day is not a religious observance, but simply a civil regulation. For years they have been exerting themselves to create a conviction in the public mind that God requires the observance of the first day. The Supreme Court has now decided that it is altogether a State affair, thus indirectly denying all that they have taught. Indeed, we see not how any religious man can rejoice in the result, or expect that good will come from it. The principle upon which the decision is given, leaves the whole matter in the hands of the Legislature, and gives them a right to alter and change at their pleasure. In carrying out the principle, one Legislature may abolish the day of weekly rest; another may require the observance of two a week; a third may require the observance of every saint's day in the calendar; and so the whole matter may become completely snarled up, in consistency with the decision of the Supreme Court. What the end of these things will be, who can predict? We have more than once suggested our fears, that the multiplication of "Sabbath Cenventions," presided over by Judges and Ex-Presidents, who had no real regard for the sacredness of the Sabbatic institution, and the circulation of Sabbath documents desigued to show how much more money could be made by resting than by working on Sunday—would remove the institution from the firm foundation of God's word to the sandy foundation of expediency and human authority. Our fears are not diminished, but rather increased, by this decision. We shall look anxiously for farther developments.

JUDGE COULTER ON THE PENNSYLVANIA CASE.

Allusion has once or twice been made to the views expressed by Judge Coulter in relation to the constitutionality of the Pennsylvania Sunday law. That our readers may understand the matter, we give below the Philadelphia Ledger's report of his remarks. It will be seen, that he maintains the constitutionality of the law for reasons directly opposite to those urged by Judge Bell. Here then we have one Judge affirming the constitutionality of the law because it guards Sunday as a religious day, "the Christian Sabbath"—and another Judge affirming its constitutionality because it does not guard Sunday as a religious day, but simply as a civil regulation, while he indirectly admits, that if the law were to guard the day for religious considerations, it must be unconstitutional.

JUDGE COULTER'S VIEWS.—On concluding the reading of Judge Bell's Opinion, Judge Coulter expressed his dissent from its argument, though not from the decision.

I concur cordially in the judgment of the Court, that the act of Assembly of 1705, and the act of 22d April, 1794, (the first entitled "An Act to restrain people from labor on the first day of the week,") are constitutional. The question has been so often decided by every Court in the Commonwealth, and so repeatedly by this Court, that I feel astonished at its being now entertained as a debateable or open question. I did not hear the opinion of Judge Bell with sufficient distinctness (being pronounced from the other end of the bench) to be quite certain, but it appeared to me to rest the strength of the argument on the mere usefulness of the day as a cessation from worldly labor. I wish it to be distinctly understood, that I believe the laws constitutional, because they guard the Christian Sabbath from profanation, and, in the language of the Act of 1794, prohibit work or worldly employment on the Lord's day.

We are a Christian people and State; we are part and parcel of a great Christian nation. All over the length and breadth of this great nation, the Christian Sabbath is recognized, and guarded by the law as a day of sacred rest. Our National Congress recognize it. All the State Legislatures recognize it. Every Convention of the people, for the establishment of State or United States Constitutions, recognized, and regarded it as a day of sacred rest. All our Courts, National or State, so regard it. William Penn, in the form of Government and laws, which he brought over to regulate the people of the new Colony, so regarded it, and enacted that as such it should be observed, as a day for worshiping the Almighty, in imitation of the primitive disciples.

The pilgrims in the Mayflower, after being long tempest-tost, when they reached the shores of this Continent, declined to land on the Sabbath day. It comes to us as a holy day from the very dawn of our existence as a people, and was so regarded, by the people from whom we sprung, since the days of King Athelstane. It is one of the primitive institutions of Christianity—one on the existence of which its continuance depends. General Christianity enters into the very frame of our social existence; it is part of the common law of the State. Law and order springing from the same source, the bosom of the Almighty, lean upon it for support. Our memories of the past—our hopes of the future, are dependent upon it. Why then should the Supreme Court not regard it, as our forefathers regarded it, and as the statute declares it to be—the Lord's day?

In many other statutes it is so denominated, and in my humble judgment ought to be so regarded by this Court, according to precedent, and for the establishment of conservative authority. I do not recognize the right of legislation, to make a day of secular cessation from labor, independent of the Christian Sabbath. It never was attempted in any Christian country, except in France, when it formally abolished Christianity, and set up the Goddess of Reason, and established the tenth day as a day of rest. But the Goddess, the tenth day, and the government have perished, or faded into the calmer lights of the mild Philosophy of the Encyclopediasts. Like water that flows, and the air we breathe, the Sabbath of rest, when the bondman and the free, the master and the apprentice, and all men meet in equality at the Christian altar—comes to us secured by the very organization of society, and the formation of the social compact. And it is therefore protected and guarded by our laws.

REVIVALS—WHAT ARE THEY?

Nothing cheers the Christian more than to learn that the work of God is revived, and that his fellow-men are preparing for the upper and better world. This cheers his heart, inspires him with new courage, enables him to lay hold on God's arm with a still firmer grasp, and to put forth more vigorous efforts. He may be induced to go beyond what duty requires, or would justify, and by a misguided judgment do much harm to the cause that he loves. When he has finished his work, "he may be saved;" but his "works," or fruits of his labor, "shall be burned up." We would do well to "take heed to ourselves and to our doctrine." In every true believer's heart, there is a deep and abiding principle of love to God and love to his fellow-men. This love will lead him to offer devout thanks to God, and constantly to seek his favor. Here is his sweetest joy. Whatever he engages in, at home or abroad, his object is to honor and glorify his God. There is a willingness on his part to do whatever God requires at his hand; and not only a willingness, but a choice and delight. Duty is no longer a task. His deep and earnest prayer, his warm and moving exhortation, and his constancy at the house of God, all show him to be a lover of the Saviour of mankind. When religion is revived, this state of things is produced.

But a Christian must go still farther; his duty does not end here; this is but a part of his work. If our religion ends here, we give but little evidence to our fellow-men that we are the children of God. Whatever God may see, there is but little evidence to man. We have duties to perform to our fellow-men, and these are not to be overlooked. The heathen world are to share in our contributions as well as our prayers. We cannot substitute the one for the other; our prayers and our alms must go together. Christ inquires, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things that I say?" And again, if we have injured in any way a brother, we will make that injury good. Some men seem to have an easy way of getting along with this matter. If they have injured a brother in reputation or in property, they seem to think that the whole claim is canceled when they get up in the public congregation and say, "If I have injured any body, I am sorry, and hope they will forgive me," when they know that they have injured a brother. Such confessions are but repeated offences. They affect not to know any thing about it, and they add hypocrisy to injury. There is, in fact, no acknowledgment of wrong here. And sometimes the injured brother is regarded as being wanting in the spirit of forgiveness, unless he is satisfied with this kind of affected repentance, while the evidence is too strong that the sorrow of the nominal penitent is not that he has injured a brother, but that he has got caught in it. If we "have by false accusation taken any thing from another," if we do not "restore four-fold," we will at least make the injured whole. Justice requires ox for ox, or sheep for sheep. This is a mere matter of justice. Less than this cannot be expected to satisfy the injured. The fast that God requires is "to undo the heavy burden, and let the oppressed go free." "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." A revival of religion will set these matters right. Short of this, our revivals may be a mere deception, and we really the worse for all we have understood ourselves to enjoy. By true revivals the altar of God will be erected and frequented, and, it will be said of us as of Saul, "Behold, he prayeth."

"His God and his Bible are all he desires,
To holiness of heart he continually aspires."

Worldly-mindedness ceases to be the ruling passion of his heart, and all matters are brought to subserve the interests of God's kingdom. And if "two mights" only are at his command, the world shares in his goods. He grudges no man his happiness, but rejoices in the prosperity of all. Instead of arrogance and self-esteem, he is filled with humility, "and esteems others better than himself. He will be as constant at the covenant and prayer-meeting, as he will at the church-meeting—as ready to pray and advise, as to exercise the rod of discipline; and if in any case he is compelled to do the latter, it is always with pain, and with an anxious desire that it may produce the reformation of the offender. Like his Saviour, "he is not willing that any should perish." The rights of every individual will be respected, black or white, bond or free, like his Lord, he is no "respecter of persons." While the world judges of a man's worth by "his bodily appearance," he makes no such distinction. He values his fellow for his moral worth, and knows no other standard. He says to all that bear the image of Christ, "We are brethren," and acts accordingly, and constantly glories in the cross of Christ. He "deals justly, loves mercy, and walks humbly with his God." Now if a revival of religion does not produce this state of things, it comes short of the standard that God has set up by which we are to judge. X.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY—NO. 4.

SELF-CONSECRATION REQUISITE.

The work of the ministry is not a work for mere official appointment. There is so much in it requiring the exercise of the affections, that it can never be efficiently and successfully prosecuted without the enlistment of the whole heart. In this respect it is unlike most other offices, where a punctilious discharge of the prescribed routine of duties may give satisfaction, though there is no hearty personal interest. But in the work of the Christian ministry, all parties concerned require that every effort to promote its objects should be begun and carried forward with a deep feeling of personal interest in the objects to be attained. No truly spiritually-minded people would be satisfied with the labors of a speculative theorist, however correct his theory, or whatever the intellectual power with which it may be sustained; because a great end of the ministry is to move the affections of the auditory heavenward, which is not to be expected of a ministry destitute of that unction from the Holy One which hath the knowledge of all things pertaining to a life of communion with God. A minister destitute of this peculiar power, might stand up and officially denounce every foul spirit of man, but if he attempts to cast such out, and make their subjects meet for the kingdom of God, he will assuredly meet with rebuff like the sons of Sceva: "Paul we know, and Jesus we know, but who are ye?" Naked and wounded he must flee his office, who thinks to bring sinners to God by a mere routine of official labors. There is a language of the heart that speaks to the heart, which eloquent lips cannot supply, where the inward impulses are wanting. But such must not only meet with failure without, but there must unavoidably arise a difficulty to supply motives to faithfulness and constancy in a labor that so often meets with stolid indifference, or is rejected with angry scorn. These most unthankful of all objects of benevolent labor, are the most needy and numerous, and those for whose good a great part of the labor of the Christian ministry must be laid out. What shall give a minister the ardor, the enthusiasm, requisite to labor on for such a class of men, if he have not an inward and hearty self-consecration to this self-denying work? He who labors for the souls of impenitent men, needs to have his own soul animated with motives drawn from sources as high as heaven itself, and to be sustained by considerations as durable as the kingdom of God. A love of ease, or secular ambition, will, if indulged, be fatal to the success of any minister of the gospel. Every Christian laborer should "arm himself with the same mind that was in Christ Jesus, who himself suffered, leaving us an example, that we should walk in his steps." He should be so largely imbued with a benevolent regard for the eternal welfare of his fellow-men, as to be able to say of those to whom he ministers, "Of whom I travail in birth until Christ be formed in them the hope of glory." This doubtless is the desire of which Paul speaks, when he says, "He that desireth the office of a Bishop, desireth a good work." Every candidate for the Christian ministry should evince this desire, not by his ambition to mount the pulpit, but by the seriousness of his deportment, the fervor of his prayers for souls, and his faithful use of those instrumentalities for benefiting the souls of men already within his reach. NIGHT CARS ON RAILROADS.—Those whose lot it is, either for business or pleasure, to travel all night in the cars, can well appreciate every attention to their comfort. Arriving in Utica, at midnight, a short time since, says the editor of the N. Y. Evangelist, on our way to Albany, we were very agreeably surprised, on entering a car belonging to the Utica and Albany Company, to find a new and magnificent car, admirably fitted up for the comfort of night travelers. On one side is a range of double seats with inclined semi-circular backs, each rising higher than the head while sitting, richly stuffed and cushioned, thus supporting the weary traveler in its soft embrace, whether he inclines to the right or the left. In this easy position he may resign himself to sleep at the rate of twenty miles an hour. On the other side is a range of single seats of the same stamp.

THE SAINT'S REST.

BY J. W. PARKER.

There is a rest, where Jesus' hand
Shall wipe the tear from sorrow's eye;
There is a glorious, heavenly land,
Reserved for all the saints on high.

There is a rest, where guilt no more
Shall rob the saints of holy joy;
Where sin and sorrow shall be o'er,
Where satan's wiles can ne'er annoy.

There is a rest, where care shall flee,
Where disappointments never come—
A state of blest tranquillity,
The Christian's safe and peaceful home.

There is a rest, which I one day,
Far from this gloomy world, shall find;
When I have cast these clods away,
And left my pains and griefs behind.

Then, O my soul, with patience bear
The light afflictions of thy clay;
They are not worthy to compare
With the bright glories of that day.

Cast far away thy doubts and fears;
Thy heavenly friend ere long will come,
And take thee from this vale of tears
Up to his bright, eternal home.

CALLING FOR THE INTEREST.—Rev. Mr. King, whose visit to this country, and eloquent appeals for Ireland, have excited so much interest, is pastor of a church in Dublin, which was founded by Samuel and Nathaniel Mather, sons of Richard Mather, of Dorchester, and brothers of Dr. Increase Mather, President of Harvard College. At the recent anniversary of the Massachusetts (Orthodox) Congregational Association, Mr. K. stated that while Nathaniel Mather was pastor of that Church, in 1676, contribution was made in Ireland, chiefly through his means, of five hundred pounds, a magnificent gift in those days, for the relief of the Plymouth and Massachusetts Colonists, then suffering under the calamities of Indian warfare. Mr. K. humorously remarked, that he had come for the interest on the interest which would have accrued from that sum to the present time, for the relief of Ireland, now suffering in her turn. It had been computed that the amount of the contribution up to the present time, at compound interest, would be thirty millions of dollars.

AMERICAN BETHEL SOCIETY.—The Annual Report of this Society, just published, discloses a degree of activity and success in a difficult but all-important field of Christian labor, but little apprehended by the Church at large. On all the principal inland water thoroughfares at the North and West, zealous and efficient missionaries have been appointed, whose business has been to hold direct personal intercourse with the sailors, boatmen, and hands employed, to distribute tracts and religious reading, and to exert a kindly Christian influence as they found opportunity. The Report presents specimens of the success which these various missionaries have realized, and exemplifies by many very interesting cases, the importance and blessedness of this field of labor. When the destitute condition of most of these men and boys is considered, and the powerful influence for evil they are scattering abroad, the benefit of some such reclaiming agency as this Society exerts, will be very apparent. Its affairs, says the Evangelist, are managed with economy and skill, and the efforts of its judicious and energetic Secretary are well directed. At the principal ports, chapels for boatmen are kept open, and the Gospel preached to many who could not be persuaded to enter any ordinary house of worship. The receipts of the last year were $7,313 19, besides $2,000 raised in Ohio, to be expended there—an increase of nearly $2,000 over the receipts of the preceding year. The Society deserves well of the public on all accounts.

ORDINATION.—In accordance with a resolution passed by the Presbytery of the Seventh-day Baptist Western Association, convened in Richburgh, on the 23d ult., Bro. Hiram P. Burdick was ordained to the Gospel Ministry in Hartsville, Steuben Co., on the 13th inst. Introductory prayer by Eld. J. H. Cochran; ordination discourse by Eld. N. V. Hull; consecrating prayer and charge by T. E. Babcock; right hand of fellowship by Eld. H. Cornwall; benediction by the candidate.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND.—A London correspondent of the National Intelligencer says that the Established Church is undergoing the ordeal of very searching and astounding statistics. The income of the clergy of the establishment is said to be £10,000,000 per annum; while that of the clergy of all Europe, independent of Great Britain, is only about £7,000,000. The arguments based upon and deduced from such statements, are not favorable to the recipients of this immense sum.

"THE MODEL WORKER" is the unique and significant title of a paper just started at Utica, by S. W. Green, formerly of the Albany Patriot. Gerrit Smith is its candidate for President of the United States, and William Goodell for Governor of the State of New York. The paper wears a clean face, and gives promise of the rare quality of originality. Success to it.

☞ A letter from Br. J. A. Begg, of Glasgow, Scotland, informs us that he has felt the Lord's rebuke in the death of his little boy in February last, and in the personal loss of health. We are glad to learn, however, that his health is now improving, and that he expects to be able in future to forward us pretty regularly those chapters of his work on the Sabbath which relate to the New Testament.

LAST WEEK'S CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

In the Senate, the amendment of the House to the bill granting half pay to the widows and orphans of soldiers killed in battle, or who died of wounds, was agreed to. Mr. Dickinson, of New York, presented a petition from Alex. B. Johnson, remonstrating against stopping the mails on Sundays, which was received, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Post Offices and Post Roads. A joint resolution from the House was passed in favor of presenting the State of Missouri with the cannon taken by Col. Doniphan, during his campaign in Mexico. Mr. Dix from the Select Committee, to whom a memorial had been referred respecting the Public Lands, reported in favor of granting Public Lands for the support of Indigent insane persons. The Select Committee on the subject reported a bill to establish a Territorial Government in Oregon, New Mexico, and California, which was read twice, and made the order of the day for Friday. The bill leaves out the slavery question altogether.

In the House of Representatives, a bill was passed in favor of extending pensions to revolutionary widows married before the year 1800. A resolution was passed calling upon the President to communicate to the House what number of Indians are comprehended within the limits of the Territories of Oregon, New Mexico, and California, with the number of posts necessary, and amount of troops to garrison them. Mr. Lahm, of Ohio, offered a resolution instructing the Committee on Territories to inquire into the expediency of appropriating a Territory or State for the occupation of the black population.

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Hibernia arrived at New York on the evening of the 21st, with seven days later intelligence, but nothing of special importance.

In France, the excitement has considerably abated. The instigators of the recent insurrection seem not to have been yet discovered. The following are the most interesting items in relation to French affairs :—

The rigor usually attendant on a state of siege is now considerably relaxed, and such of the tradespeople of Paris as are not bankrupts, have re-opened their shops and bureaux. A notice has been sent to the theatres and places of public amusement by the police, that they are authorized to re-open.

The Committee of Inquiry into the insurrection, having represented that they would not conclude the inquiry for a fortnight, the city is to remain in a state of siege till the 25th inst.

The greatest embarrassment is produced by the enormous number of prisoners arising out of the late insurrection, which now exceeds 10,000. It is said that of those who have been examined, already grounds have been elicited for prosecuting 2,000. It has been ascertained that at least 40,000 persons either constructed barricades, fought against the defenders of order, or committed assassinations.

In the best informed quarters, the general opinion prevails that the real chief of the late insurrection was Caussidière. It is said that things were not unknown to Louis Blanc, but that he shrunk from any active share.

Documents have been found implicating Girardin in having received money from Russia, the Carlists, Orleanists, and Bonapartes. Russian roubles are said to have been found in his apartments.

A circumstance has transpired which has created no little surprise. M. de Lamartine is about to quit France. The pretext is, that he intends to travel in the East, and that he is to be accompanied by Madame de Lamartine.

M. de Chataubriand, author of the 'Genius of Christianity,' died in Paris, July 4.

War of Galley Slaves in Sicily.—A revolt had taken place on the 25th among the galley slaves at Procida. It was said that this originated in the refusal of the Government to liberate those who had completed their term of punishment. Some contend that the movement was political. In the morning, while the authorities and troops were occupied in a religious procession, 1,700 of the slaves armed themselves with swords, axes, and crow-bars, and attacked a body of about 100 men left in charge of them; the latter were soon reinforced by the islanders and a portion of the national guard. The conflict continued several hours, until reinforcements arrived from Pozzuoli and from Naples. At length the insurrection was subdued. About 500 of the prisoners were killed and wounded; about half that number, at least, being killed.

Hungary.—A bloody engagement has taken place at Weisskirchen between the Germans and the Illyrians. Letters from Bucharest of the 15th announce that all political affairs are suspended on account of the cholera, which has raged there with virulence for the last five days; since the 7th of the month about 160 persons had been attacked daily, of whom 50 had been carried off. It had been found necessary to decree a general closing of the courts of law throughout Moldavia and Wallachia, in consequence of the fearful ravages which the cholera is making in these principalities.

Cholera in Russia.—The cholera has broken out in St. Petersburg in a violent form, invading alike the palaces of the rich and houses of the poor. The malady broke out in the Russian capital on the 24th ult., and an immense number of patients have already succumbed beneath its virulence. Six hospitals have been prepared for the reception of cholera patients alone. In Moscow the pestilence is decimating the population. In two days, (the 11th and 12th of June,) of 222 patients, 122, or more than one-half succumbed. It is affirmed, moreover, that the disease has developed itself in twenty other governments or districts in the southern parts of the empire.

SUMMARY.

The amount of uncurrent money received at the Foreign Money department of the Suffolk Bank, on Wednesday, last week, says the Boston Traveler, was 850,000 dollars; and at the Receiving Teller's department over 150,000 dollars—making more than one million dollars, which was paid in at that bank in the course of six hours on Wednesday. From the 1st of January to the 1st of July, the Foreign Money department alone, received and redeemed upwards of eighty-six million dollars. This vast amount was paid in, to a great extent, in small bills, and the aggregate bulk of the whole mass was probably something like a thousand bushels.

In New York, lately, Wm. Farthing, a native of Philadelphia, aged 38 years, was found dead. He was a sea captain, and some five years since was married, went to sea, was gone four years and a half, and returned by way of Rio a few days ago. During his absence his wife proved faithless and became an abandoned profligate. The news affected his mind, and at 8 o'clock in the morning he was found sitting dead on the end of his bed, leaning against the corner post.

Fifteen citizens of Warren Co., Ohio, were recently arrested and held to bail in the sum of $4,000 each, to await the answer of the Governor of Ohio, to a requisition of the Governor of Kentucky, in which they were charged with stealing five slaves, having aided them after they had escaped. The Cincinnati Herald states that Gov. Bebb had refused to grant the requisition, on the ground that Ohio laws do not recognize property in man.

The Milwaukie Sentinel of the 10th says of the crops in that State, that the Winter Wheat has suffered a good deal from the fly, and will not be more than an average crop. The quality, however, promises to be superior. As to the spring crops, they are much above an average, and up to the present time look as well as any farmer could wish. We doubt not that the surplus for export will be much larger this year than in any previous season, and the prospect is fair for good prices.

A young man, named Wm. Strickland, said to be from Flushing, L. I., and to have left a widow, was instantly killed on board the steamer New York, last Saturday evening, on her passage from this city to New Haven. He was at work about the engine, and is supposed to have been hit by the crank, which crushed his head in a shocking manner, depriving him instantly of life.

Mr. G. R. Baldwin, an American engineer, has made a report on the works destined to supply the city of Quebec with pure water. It is a very lucid and talented document. It proposes two places, one to fetch the water from the Lake St. George, the other from the Trois Sauts in the River Montmorency. The cost is estimated in either case at about $620,000.

The St. Louis New Era states, that a project has been submitted by an experienced engineer in that city, to the City Council, to run an omnibus on Broadway, from North Market to the Upper Ferry, the vehicle to be propelled by steam. It is further proposed to water or sprinkle the street the whole length of the contemplated line by the same agency, the persons living on the street to pay if they choose for the same.

The Charter Oak, at Hartford, Conn., remarks, that 'the anti-slavery action of the General Association of Connecticut this year, has been far in advance of anything done by them before, and augurs well in its promise of better action still to come. There were a large number of earnest anti-slavery men in the Association, who were decided and strong in their purpose to press this great question affecting the church, its purity, and peace.

Important rumors have been received from Tampico. The Mexican Government having sent a force to take possession of that town, the citizens opposed its entrance. No farther particulars are given. An American, writing from London, says: "I passed an auction room were pictures were selling, and while I stood there a number were sold at 400 to 600 guineas each; the effects of a French Count. Louis Philippe has an income of only £1,500 a year, and Guizot is quite poor. The French Princes look forlorn."

She made a profession of the religion of Jesus Christ in early life, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, R. I., from which place she removed to Petersburg and united with the Church of the same faith and order in that place; from thence to Adams, and became a member of the Church in that place, where she lived a witness for the Saviour and the religion she professed, until, as we believe, she was called to join the church triumphant. ## BESSIE.

BY WILLIAM H. BURLEIGH.

She lay before me in her little shroud,
Her pale hands softly folded on her breast,
As if, o'erwearied, she had sunk to rest,
To dream of heaven, and of the radiant crowd
That tread its golden pavements. Not a trace
Of dying anguish lingered on her face;
But round her lips a sweetly serious smile
Still seemed to play—a token from the Lord
Of bliss upon her sinless spirit poured.
Then came a thought of Him who blessed, erewhile,
Young children—"Suffer them to come to me!"
Still thrilled that heavenly voice upon my ear,
And my heart answered, as I dropped a tear,
Thy will be done!—we leave our child with Thee!

When over her sweet face the coffin lid
Was closed forever, and with tears we gave
Our loveliest to the keeping of the grave,
(And who that knew her would our tears forbid?)
"'T is a sad world," said one, "a world of woe,
Where Sorrow reigns supreme." Yet from my heart
The all-sustaining hope did not depart;
But, to its impulse true, I answered—"No!
The World hath much of good—nor seldom Joy
Over our spirits broods with radiant wing!
Gladness from grief, and life from death, may spring;
Treasures are ours the grave cannot destroy,
Then chide not harshly our Instructress stern,
Whose solemn lessons Wisdom bids us learn!"

THE CITY OF MEXICO.

The city of Mexico is said to be the finest built city on the American continent. In the principal streets the houses are all constructed on the strictest architectural rules. The first buildings were erected by Cortes, who did every thing well, from writing a couplet, to conquering an empire. Many of the finest buildings in Mexico are still owned by his descendants. The public square is unsurpassed by any in the world; it contains some ten or twelve acres paved with stone. The Cathedral covers one entire side, the Palace another; the western side is occupied by a row of very high and substantial houses, the second stories of which project into the street the width of the pavement; the lower stories are occupied by the principal retail merchants of the city. The most of these houses were built by Cortes, who, with his characteristic sagacity, and an avarice which equally characterized him in the latter part of his life, selected the best portion of the city for himself.

The President's Palace, formerly the palace of the viceroys, is an immense building of three stories high, about five hundred feet in length, and three hundred and fifty wide; it stands on the site of the palace of Montezuma, which was destroyed by Cortes. It is difficult to conceive of so much stone and mortar being put together in a less tasteful and imposing shape. It has much more the appearance of a cotton factory or a penitentiary, than what it really is. Only a very small part of this palace is appropriated to the residence of the President. All the public offices are here, including the heads of the different departments, ministers of justice, treasury, &c. The halls of the deputies and of the Senate, are in the same building, and also that of the botanic garden.

The Cathedral, which occupies the site of the great idol temple of Montezuma, is five hundred feet long by four hundred and twenty wide. Like all the other churches in Mexico, it is built in the Gothic style. The walls, of several feet in thickness, are made of unhewn stone and lime.

The streets of Mexico are uncommonly wide, much more so than is necessary, considering that they are not obstructed, as in our city, by drays and wagons. The sidewalks are uncommonly narrow. The streets are all paved with round stones; the sidewalks with rough flat ones. The walls are built of rough stones of all shapes and sizes, with large quantities of lime mortar. The streets cross each other at right angles, dividing the whole city into squares. Each of these squares is called a street, and has a separate name. Instead of designating the street in its whole extent by one name, each side of every square has a different name, and names which sound to the Protestant ear very much like the violation of the third article of the decalogue, such as the street of Jesus, and the street of the Holy Ghost. In most of these streets there is a church, which gives the name to the street on which it stands. In many instances the church and convents cover the whole square, not with separate buildings, but one single edifice, with the usual court or open space in the centre. There is not, I believe, a house in the city without this court, of greater or less dimensions, in proportion to the size of the building. There is only one door on the lower story, and that high enough for a coach to pass through. It opens into the court, through which you pass to the steps leading to the upper story, where alone every body lives except the lowest classes. The basement story is only occupied by the servants, and as lumber rooms, and what appears very strange as stables. There is not in the whole city such a separate building as a stable. "In visiting Count Certuna," says Mr. Thompson, "whose whole establishment is altogether princely, I found this court on the ground floor used as a stable, and passed through rows of horses and carriages, to make my way to the most spacious halls, filled with fine paintings of the great masters, and furnished throughout in a style altogether gorgeous." In some of the large private buildings, thirty and forty different families reside; each one having rented one or two rooms, all entering at the only outside door into the court, which is the common property of all, and from which each one has an entrance into his own rooms on the ground floor or the gallery above, which runs all around the building. The area of Mexico does not exceed two miles in length, and a mile and a half in width, a very small space to be occupied by a population of nearly 200,000. But it is not at all surprising, when you see thirty or forty families all huddled away in one house, and consider what a large number sleep in the open air in that delightful climate. How pure must be the atmosphere, when Mexico is so remarkably healthy, notwithstanding such a crowded and filthy mode of living, and with a tropical sun shining upon the moist surface of the whole valley!

It is a little curious, that whilst the buildings and the population of Mexico are thus crowded into so small a space, that rents are three times as high as in New York, yet all around the city there is vacant ground, and as dry as the city itself, which may be had almost for taking. "I was riding out with a friend one evening," says Mr. Thompson, "when he showed me a square containing between five and six acres, just on the out-skirts of the city, and not more than half a mile from the public square, which he had just purchased for four hundred dollars!"

The city is partly supplied with provisions and vegetables by small boats, which bring them over the lake of Tezcuco; but as the lake is very shallow in the months of January and February, the supply is then generally stopped, and the city depends, especially for vegetables, on the supply by the canal of Iztapalapan, which leads from the lake of Xochimilco to the town. This canal is narrow, but always covered with small canoes loaded with fruits and vegetables; it passes through the chinampas, or floating gardens, which, in their present state, are long narrow strips of ground, redeemed from the surrounding swamp, and intersected by small canals. They are well cultivated, abound in fine vegetables, and their edges are planted with poplars. It is stated that they originally consisted of wooden rafts, covered with earth, and floated about in the lake when it was full of water, whence their name is derived. At present they are stationary, but it is said there are still some floating gardens in the Lake Xochimilco. [Farnham's Mexico.

INSPIRATION OF ASTRONOMY.

There are several recorded instances of the powerful effect which the study of astronomy has produced upon the human mind. Dr. Rittenhouse, of Pennsylvania, after he had calculated the transit of Venus, which was to happen June 3, 1769, was appointed, at Philadelphia, with others, to repair to the township of Norristown, and there to observe this planet until its passage over the sun's disc should verify the correctness of his calculations. This occurrence had never been witnessed but twice before by any inhabitant of our earth, and was never to be again seen by any person then living. A phenomenon so rare, and so important in its bearings upon astronomical science, was indeed well calculated to agitate the soul of one so alive as he was to the great truths of nature. The day arrived, and there was no cloud in the horizon. The observers, in silence and trembling anxiety, waited for the predicted moment of observation. It came—and in the instant of the contact, an emotion of joy so powerful was excited in the bosom of Mr. Rittenhouse, that he fainted. Sir Isaac Newton, after he had advanced so far in his mathematical proof of one of his great astronomical doctrines as to see that the result was to be trimuphant, was so effected in view of the momentous truth, which he was about to demonstrate, that he was unable to proceed, and begged one of his companions in study, to relieve him and carry out the calculation. The instructions, which the heavens give, are not confined to scholars; but they are imparted to the peasant and to the savage. The pious shepherd often feels a sudden expansion of mind, while attempting to form an idea of that power, which spread out and adorned the heavens with so many words of light.

"I CANNOT TELL A LIE."

In the war of the Revolution, while General Lafayette commanded in the American army, a part of the troops were encamped near the water's edge. One summer evening, a soldier, who was an excellent swimmer as well as fifer, took his fife with him to the water, and engaged in fifing and swimming at the same time. The music reached the ear of Lafayette. Early the next morning, he sent an officer in pursuit of the man who had thus disobeyed the orders of the camp. The soldier was a man of Connecticut and a man of truth. When arrested by the officer, he considered that, perhaps, he might escape a severe punishment by denying the deed. On a moment's reflection, however, he said to himself, "I have always spoken the truth—I cannot tell a lie." With this principle in his mind, he came into the presence of the General, who asked if he were the individual who played upon the water the evening previous; to which he replied, "I am." "To-morrow, then, at such an hour, I wish you to repair to my tent."

He came at the appointed time. The General then informed him, that the tune which he had heard the evening before affected him very much—that on a former occasion it had been played at the funeral of a dear friend of his who had died in his native country. Since then, until now, he had never met with an individual who could play it. "For the purpose of indulging in the melancholy pleasure of hearing it once more, I have," said he, "sent for you." The General, after being agreeably entertained with the conversation and music of his guest, dismissed him with his thanks and some money from his purse, as an expression of his satisfaction for the performance.

"I cannot tell a lie," boys, is a good rule to follow.

THE CUP OF COLD WATER.

A young English woman was sent to France to be educated in a Huguenot school in Paris. A few evenings before the fatal massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day, she and some of her young companions were taking a walk in some part of the town where there were sentinels placed, perhaps on the walls; and you know that when a young soldier is on guard, he must not leave his post until he is relieved—that is, till another soldier comes to take his place. One of these soldiers, as the young ladies passed him, besought them to have the charity to bring him a little water, adding, that he was very ill, and that it would be as much as his life was worth, to go and fetch it himself. The ladies walked on, much offended at the man for presuming to speak to them, all but the English woman, whose compassion was moved, and who, leaving her party, procured some water, and brought it to the soldier. He begged her to tell him her name and place of abode; and this she did. When she rejoined her companions, some blamed and others ridiculed her attention to a common soldier; but they soon had reason to lament that they had not been equally compassionate, for the grateful soldier contrived, on the night of the massacre, to save this young English woman, while all the other inhabitants of the house she dwelt in, were killed!

GOOD ADVICE.

A professional gentleman, of rare attainments, and one who added to the laborious duties of his calling a great variety of learning, much scientific research, and many elegant accomplishments, was asked by a young lady how he found time for all he did. He replied, "There is one rule which I have found of great use, and therefore recommend it to you; and that is always to do small things, such as writing a letter, copying out some short piece, making a sketch, reading a review, &c., in small portions of time, and to reserve a whole day of leisure for some long and important affair. Never use up a rainy morning in doing a variety of little jobs, and think because you dispatch a great many, that you have well bestowed your time; leave small affairs for odd half hours, and use your uninterrupted morning for something that cannot be done in half hours. You have sometimes wondered at my having time to correspond with so many absent friends; but all my letters of friendship are written in odd minutes, while I am waiting for people who are not as punctual to their appointments as I am."

Chinese Dentist.—The dentist pitches his tent on arriving, and unfolds to the admiring crowd a huge scroll, on which, at the left side, are set forth his home, place of birth, &c.; the rest of the scroll speaks of his fame and skill in cleansing, curing, and knowledge of the mouth in general. If this fails to obtain a customer, he opens box after box, producing hundreds of human teeth, on which he lectures, declaring each large and decayed tooth to have belonged to a prince, duke, or high mandarin, who had honored him with his patronage, and thus saved himself from the most terrific tortures. Should a bystander at last be attracted, and offer his mouth for inspection, the instruments are produced, and if extraction be required, it is done with much expertness; he shows the instrument to the crowd, describes its use and power, and as an illustration of it, draws the tooth, while the sufferer imagines he is merely going to show how he would do it; if cleansing is required, he exhibits his instruments, one by one, and using each, keeps up a chant and lecture alternately; after the opera tion is performed, he recommends his powders; I tried several, and detected a strong mixture of camphor in all. Thus he continues, until having remained a short space without a customer, he packs up and moves to another convenient spot. [Forbes' China.

Migration of Eels.—The curious were startled the other day, (says the Banffshire, Scotland, Gazette,) by seeing a whole shoal of eels wending their way up the Deveron, to their summer retreats. The shoal was not less than 300 yards in length, was of considerable breadth and depth, and was steadily passing upwards at the rate of a mile an hour. No obstacle seemed to retard its progress. The mill-lead was traversed and the waterfall ascended. This interesting phenomena is witnessed every year about the same time, and shoals of several miles in length are at times seen. It is thus explained: At the beginning of winter, the whole eel tribe descend from the upper parts of rivers, where the cold is most severe, to the mouth of the stream; where, amid the brackish water, they enjoy a diminished temperature, and deposit their spawn. From these spring the young fry, to whom the warm weather forms a signal to ascend the rivers; and in their upward progress they congregate in such shoals as that above mentioned.

Atmospheric Pressure.—Animals living upon mountains are found to have much larger lungs than those of the vallies. In the city of Mexico, which is several thousand feet above the level of the sea, consumption and pulmonary complaints are never found, unless taken there, the air being much lighter, requires larger and better-developed lungs in such places than in valleys, where they are contracted by the weight of the atmosphere. We are not apt to notice the weight of the atmosphere, which is equal to fifteen pounds to every square inch of the body, because it is equal in all directions.

This pressure also enables some animals and insects to walk up smooth surfaces; thus the fly has the power to form a vacuum under its feet, when the outward pressure holds it to the substance which it ascends, which is not the case with other insects; the cat and lion have this property to a limited extent.

Something of a Curiosity.—A short time ago, there was found at Kittanning, Armstrong Co., Pa., a gun barrel, in the trunk of a hemlock tree, the barrel passing through the tree nearly horizontally, and almost grown in. The barrel was a little more than three feet in length. It had a breech and fluted to the muzzle, which is also what is called 'bell-muzzled'—differing from any style of gun now in use, or which has been used within the recollection of the oldest inhabitant. It had the appearance of being an elegantly finished article, its sights being gold, and breech pin pure silver. How it came there, and how long it has been there, are the questions which elicit solution. It must have been lost or left there before the tree commenced its growth; but how long before, and by whom no one can tell or surmise. The age of the tree, judging from the number of grains in it, on either side of the heart, is 110 years, and yet, strange to say, the gun bore but very slight evidences of rust or decay. When found, the breech was just above the surface of the ground, and the muzzle slightly imbedded in the earth. It was loaded with a ball.

Specimen of Legislation.—A clever farmer, who, by the way, owned a grist mill, was sent to the Legislature. He, like many before and since, resolved to be the father of some important measure. And so, while looking to the public good, and at the same time seeking his own ends, he resolved that the practice of bringing large salt sacks holding four bushels, (too much for his miller to lift,) should be stopped. Accordingly, at the first opportunity he introduced a bill, making it the duty of a man to bring his grain to the mill in bags not to exceed two bushels in capacity, and that in every case where they should exceed that quantity, the bag and grain should be forfeited to the mill. This ridiculous measure was put to rest in the following manner. One of the members proposed an additional section, in about the following language:

"And be it further enacted, that in case any person shall carry to mill any bag containing less than two bushels, the miller shall in every such case make up all such deficiency, so that there shall be uniformity, and every man always have two bushels of grain to be ground, no more and no less."

Nothingarians.—There is a large class of persons in this world, occupying room on the earth which is worth considerably more than their company, who live, move, and have a being, or rather, who have a being and stay, without moving at all to any good purpose, who may be justly called, what they are in fact—nothingarians. They do indeed toil, or seem to toil, but all their toil resolves itself into an effort to avoid toil; and thus they work out the paradox of working harder to avoid work, than others work to perform it. We cannot well describe them, for they resemble nothing in particular but themselves, and that is almost nothing at all. We can imagine nothing nearer a cypher than a something in human shape, which practically amounts to nobody—"says little, thinks less, does nothing;" neither does good nor gets good, decays, and leaves the world a mere negative. Cowper could have thought of nothing but a nothingarian when he wrote:

Defend me, therefore, say I,——————
———————————— from the toil
Of dropping buckets into empty wells,
And growing old in drawing nothing up.

Anecdote of Judge Parsons.—The following anecdote has not, to our knowledge, appeared in print. The bar of Essex county, Mass., had made a rule that no lawyer should take into his office more than three students. But it so happened, that the celebrity of Parsons, then a practising lawyer in Essex, had gained him more than his due share, and he was accused before the bar of having five students. He denied the charge; but it being clearly proved that there were in his office five young gentlemen aiming at the law, it was a matter of curious speculation among his legal brethren how he would get himself clear of the accusation. "Why, gentlemen," said he, "I have positively but three students, and I believe I can prove it to your entire satisfaction. It is true, I have five young men in my office, but then one of them is a dandy, and the other a fiddler."

VARIETY.

In the year 1762, (says the Rev. Mr. Heckwelder,) I was witness to a remarkable instance of the disposition of the Indians to indulge their wives. There was a famine in the land, and a sick Indian woman expressed a great desire for a mess of Indian corn. Her husband having heard that a trader at Lower Sandusky had a little, set off on horseback for that place, one hundred miles distant, and returned with as much corn as filled the crown of his hat, for which he gave his horse in exchange, and came home on foot, bringing his saddle back with him.

A man puzzled himself with the following question—"What will be the consequence if an irresistible force should come in contact with an immovable body?" To this question he answered—"I suppose it will knock a hole in it." A wit replied—"Knock a hole in what?—the irresistable force, or the immovable body?" and added—"It is impossible to do such a thing to a force; and if the hole is knocked in the body, some part will give way, which will show that it is not immovable."

Let us cherish good humor and Christian cheerfulness. Let us endeavor to shake off that sullenness which makes us so uneasy to ourselves, and to all who are near to us. Pythagoras quelled the perturbations of his mind by the use of his harp; and David's music calmed the distraction of Saul, and banished the evil spirit from him. Anger, fretfulness, and peevishness, prey upon the tender fibres of our frame, and injure our health.

Infants only a month old are often seen to smile in their sleep. Dr. Beattie says, "I have heard good women remark, that the innocent babe is then favored with some glorious vision. But that a babe should have visions or dreams, before it has ideas, can hardly be imagined. This is probably the effect, not of thought, but of some transient contraction or expansion of the muscles. Certain it is, that no smiles are more captivating."

It is worthy of remark, that no person who took a newspaper regularly and paid for it, was ever convicted of capital offence. No such person was ever sent to the penitentiary, or any other prison. No such person ever committed suicide, or went to the lunatic asylum; and, with a few exceptions, longevity has been the consequence of so upright a practice.

A man, on being told by a generous farmer that he would give him a barrel of cider, asked the farmer if he would bring it to his house. "Certainly," replied the farmer, "with pleasure." "Well," said the grateful man, "what will you pay me for the barrel when the cider is gone?"

At the bottom of a lake, the water must be heavier than at the surface, and if it be deep enough, there must be a point at which a stone will not sink below it, and this has given rise to stories of ponds without bottom, because the sounding stone could never find it.

The average sickness of human life has been computed at two years in every seventy, or about ten days per annum. Before forty years of age, it is but half, but after that epoch it increases rapidly and in a continually progressing ratio, till the close of life.

Water running takes a power to stop it equal to its own weight multiplied by its velocity, which is also the law governing projectiles; upon the same principle is explained the method of raising water by means of the hydraulic ram.

The leech has the property of exhausting the air from the spot on which it fastens, then makes his bite, and the pressure of the air drives the blood into his mouth. Cupping instruments are also applied on the same principle. The musquito understands the trade to a diamond shaving.

Good counsel is cast away upon the arrogant, the self-conceited, or the stupid, who are either too proud to take it, or too heavy to understand it.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

BOARD OF INSTRTCTION.

W. C. KENYON, A. M., } Principals.
IRA SAYLES, A. M., }

Assisted by nine able and experienced Teachers, five in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past ten years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to also continue to merit a share of public patronage

Extensive buildings are now erected for the accommodation of students, and for Recitation and Lecture Rooms, &c. They occupy an eligible position, and are finished in the best style of modern architecture; and the different apartments are heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical

Ladies and Gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board and rooms can also be had in private families, if particularly desired.

Each room for those who board in the Hall is furnished with a bed and bedding, a table, two chairs, and a pail.

The plan of instruction adopted in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the student, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The Health, the Manners, and the Morals of our Students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

REGULATIONS.

1. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.
2. Punctuality in attending all regular Academic exercises will be required.
3. The use of Tobacco, for chewing or smoking, will not be allowed either in or about the Academic buildings.
4. Playing at games of chance cannot be allowed.
5. Using profane language cannot be allowed.
6. The use of any kind of intoxicating drinks cannot be allowed, unless prescribed in case of sickness, by a regular physician.
7. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, cannot be permitted.
8. Gentlemen and ladies of the Institution will not be permitted to visit the rooms of the opposite sex, except in cases of imperious necessity, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.
9. Good order must be maintained at all times, and in all the rooms and halls of the Institution, and in all the intercourse of students with each other.
10. All students are required to retire regularly at the ringing of the bell designated for that purpose, as occasion may require; and to rise at the ringing of the morning bell, also designated.
11. Any room, occupied by students, will, at all times, be subject to the visitation of the Teachers of the Institution, who are required to see that the regulations are complied with.
12. Students will be required to keep their own rooms in good order, and to pay all unnecessary damages, either of rooms or of furniture furnished with the rooms.

REGULAR ACADEMIC EXERCISES.

The regular exercises, at which all the students will be required to attend, unless specially excused, are, Chapel exercises each morning during the term; Recitations, from two to four, five days each week, from Monday morning till Friday evening. Compositions and Declamations, one-half day, once in two weeks, Literary, Scientific, and Moral Lectures by the Principals. Public Worship, once in each week, either on Saturday or Sunday, according as the students may be in the habit of keeping the Sabbath, either on the seventh or first day of the week.

GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the students will be in the hands of the Principals, and will be strictly and steadily exercised, and at the same time, strictly parental. The object of our academic government being to secure the greatest possible amount of physical, intellectual, and moral good to the students themselves, regularity and order of exercises, and good and wholesome citizens to society. No unwarrantable means will be made use of to enforce the observance of the above regulations; yet our constant endeavor will be, to make the means resorted to as effective as humun means may be.

Parents who place their children in this Institution, and all students who are sufficiently old to understand the necessity of order, cannot be too well assured that the foregoing regulations form the most essential part of the contract between them and us; and that whatever student wantonly violates them, and shows himself incorrigibly determined on pursuing his waywardness, will be expelled from the privileges of the Institution, and will not be permitted to re-enter it again, without special proof of reformation. Nor will an expelled student have any deduction made from full term charges.

Farther, parents are requested not to place money for expenses, in the hands of students who are not old enough to use money with discretion, and economy. Either of the Principals, or the Book-keeper of the Institution, will act as fiscal guardian of such students without charge.

ADMISSION.

Candidates for admission as students, must present testimonials of good moral character, or be known to possess such a character, and must be willing to comply unreservedly with the foregoing regulations; and no one will be permitted to receive instructions in any class, until all academic bills, for the term in prospect, be paid or satisfactorily arranged.

ACADEMIC TERMS.

The Academic Year for 1848–9 consists of three terms, as follows:

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1848, and ending Thursday, November 23, 1848.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, December 5, 1848, and ending Thursday, March 15, 1849.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, April 3, 1849, and ending July 12, 1849.

As the plan of instruction in this Institution, laid out for each class, will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue through the term, and accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the terms.

N. B. Students who are expecting to teach during the winter or summer, will specify such intention on entering in the beginning of the fall or spring term; and, for the special accommodation of such, a day will be set apart at first, on which they can leave, if they wish; and they will not be permitted to leave on any other day, nor will any other than teachers be permitted to leave on the day specified.

Farther, it is of the utmost importance that the student be present at the day of the opening of the term, as on that and the succeeding day, the students entering are examined and classified.

It is also suggested to parents who patronize this Institution from the distance of a few miles around, that students should go home only once during the term, as every absence from classes is always attended with disadvantages to the student. This is a suggestion, and not imperative. But to meet this suggestion, the exercise of the school will close at noon on the seventh Friday in each term, and open again on the afternoon of Monday following.

LETTER FROM MRS. CARPENTER.

The Chinese New Year—A New Year's Call—The Feast of Lanterns—Birds, Kites, etc.

The following paragraphs are taken from a letter of Mrs. Carpenter to Paul Stillman, dated Shanghai, China, Feb. 10th 1848.

We are all quite well, although I have only myself for the first time yesterday, since my sickness, which commenced on the 26th of November, gone into a friend's house. I must, however, except a few calls which I have made among my Chinese neighbors, who are so friendly that we must call them friends, although we can hardly make ourselves sociable for want of the gift of tongues, which, alas, is no longer imparted, but which, by long and vigorous effort, we hope to attain in a measure. The difficulties, although great, are not insurmountable. I speak now of the prospects of Mr. C. and Mr. W., who certainly, I think, are going ahead very well. We who must learn the dialect of the kitchen, or hazard the alternative of having a stone brought us when we ask for bread, are also in the road to knowledge. Although the kitchen does not furnish wings for literary or linguistic aspirants, it is still an invaluable school for us, as we take upon us to manage that department as nearly as possible independent of our husbands' time. This occupies us but a small part of the day, and leaves us as much time as we need to spend with the teachers, say from three to six hours, besides our mornings and evenings for walks, calls, and such reading and writing as may be desirable. Thus we contrive to learn somewhat, and leave the more time to those whose ability to do good demands it.

The Chinese New Year commences on the fifth of February, and we are now in the midst of the holidays, which are to continue half a month. The shops are shut, business is laid aside, the teachers have all deserted us, the natives are in their best attire, and nothing is to be seen but friends interchanging calls and congratulations, each with a bundle of cards in his hand, or fastened at the back of his sedan-chair if he happens to ride, or carried by a servant in his holiday suit, who hands them in to the attendants, or leaves them at going, or thrusts them through the door-ways of the houses where calls are to be made hereafter, or friendships kept up through the year. But of all these things you have a fac simile in New York every first of January, and the wonder is, whence originated a custom which is precisely the same in a heathen and a Christian city. The gentlemen do the calling, pass the compliments, are treated to tea and refreshments, fruits and sweetmeats of all mentionable kinds, or rather all unmentionable kinds, and which are, I suppose, rather too national to find a parallel on the other side [illegible] globe. There is this slight difference, however, that the tables are served by men, instead of the ladies of the house, who do not appear, unless to receive the calls of ladies, which are occasionally made on the first day, but more frequently the few succeeding days. Even the poor beggars do not forget to keep the festival, and proudly display high over their miserable heads the branch of an evergreen, laden with the fruits of their begging, in the form of cash, suspended by various colored threads, to suit the fancy of the exulting owner. In our walks nothing is to be heard but "Koo-she, koo-she, pah-nea," which is echoed and reëchoed until it has become the most familiar of all household words. The meaning is, "I congratulate you on this new year." We have received many cards and calls, and have returned them as far as we were able, have been most politely received and entertained, have received "koo-shes" enough to make us all happy till next December if that can do it, have seen and been seen, laughed and been laughed at, and promised ourselves to make these friendly calls available in our future doings. But you will not be satisfied without particulars, and as one visit will suffice for a sample of the whole, I give you the one we have to-day made at the house of our teacher, Lin Sea-sang.

By the time we had reached the entrance, we were, as usual, thronged with natives, who were promptly desired by the porter to withdraw. If they did so, they either returned or their places were supplied by others, for there was a crowd continually about the door, all perfectly quiet, however, and seeming to have no object but to please themselves by gazing at us, and laughing at our attempts to make ourselves at home in Chinese. From the opposite door there soon entered a crowd of females, who formed a semi-circle around us, at a respectful distance, and were most assiduous and kind in their attempts to free us from all embarrassment. Our teacher's wife, Lin Nyang-nyang, we found to be a most dignified and lady-like woman, very polite to us, and cordial in the extreme, and seemed delighted at this opportunity to introduce us to her neighbors. The reception-room (as is always the case) was on the ground floor, which is generally of tiles or brick, and uncarpeted. Opposite the entrance was a large table, laden with various splendid decorations, and doubtless the household god, lamps, vases, and pictures, and a good supply of cards, which, being the order of the day, must occupy their brief supremacy with becoming display. The table was covered with a crimson cloth spread, richly embroidered, especially the front, which presented a huge elephant in gay colors, and corresponded exactly in shades, but not in design, to the hangings on the arm-chairs. These were cushioned, and placed alternately with small stands, on all sides of the room. Tea was soon brought, in covered cups placed in little metalic trays, into which they exactly fitted, and which formed a fine substitute for saucers, which the Chinese do not use. The varieties of their trays are as great as the sets they help to form; at least I have never seen them alike in any two houses. A very large waiter was next brought before us, divided into various compartments, each filled with its appropriate luxury, and all of the same indescribable kinds I mentioned before, with the exception of a kind of cake like the cup-cake of our own country, being very small, and of the most curious forms. These were continually urged upon us, and were rather agreeable to the taste, (the little we tasted.) They were considerate enough at parting to fill our hands and handkerchief to bring away. Many of the ladies who came in were most splendidly dressed; one in particular might remind you of the "robe of royalty, of blue and white," which the king put upon Mordecai, and which I am sure exceeded his in the rich embroidery of its phylacteries, they being done in landscapes of the most exquisite finish. And such feet, if a mere point can be called a foot, even when enclosed in the most elegant little shoe imaginable. These little feet seem to answer the design of the wise inventor wonderfully, for although they do not confine them forever within doors, they induce short calls, as sitting is rarely indulged in, and long standing must be very painful. I was delighted with our hostess, although unable to converse much with her, except through her less-educated neighbors. Of this difficulty the teacher had forewarned me, and had presented it as a reason for her never calling here, that she was not familiar with the Shanghai dialect. In speaking of it since, he tells us she is a learned woman, in books, and speaks in a style too high-flown for common conversation. Their only son, a boy of twelve years, who often comes with his father, and who writes the character beautifully, seems fast following in the steps of his mother, his father being often obliged to interpret for us, because the child does not understand the spoken language.

Feb. 19th, eight o'clock, evening.—We have been out to witness the display of the Feast of Lanterns. They enlighten the city in the most splendid manner, being suspended at the doors of shops and houses, among the branches of trees, on the tops of poles, from the masts of ships, upon the door-posts of all the temples, are carried about in the hand, and have assumed altogether the ascendancy for the time being, unless indeed the sky-rockets, which are as numerous and as transient as fire flies in summer, compel them to yield the palm. It is a grand illumination, and to whatever accident we are indebted for the origin of the custom, it is a most beautiful and innocent one. We went a long distance on the city wall, in order to have a better view of the lights on the ships, which are altogether the most interesting part of the exhibition, to me, especially as I choose to adopt the tradition that it had its origin in the drowning of a mandarin's daughter, and the anxiety of her father to recover the body, who in his efforts illuminated both ship and shore with the lighted lanterns. Mr. C. inquired of Lin Sea-sang, what he knew of its origin, who, with the most child-like simplicity and seriousness, replied that it had always existed. Being told of the tradition, he said he knew nothing of it, and insisted that it had ever been observed.

23d.—Let me tell you about our birds. I do not know how many we own in all, but I know that the tiles are like an inhabited city—that they are the only residents of this old haunted castle that have not felt like complaining at the cold—(perhaps they have, but not in my hearing)—and every night and every morning, as regularly as ourselves, they assemble for a united song of joy and praise. Their family altar is a large tree which stands in our yard, and whose leafless boughs, numerous as they are, when laden with their feathered charge, are the most beautiful branches a tree ever boasted. It is now half past four, and I see them gathering one after another, and soon the tree will be full. To me there is a beauty in this forest worship, which I never looked for in a city, much less in a heathen city. But these heaven-taught songsters are not heathen; they have no other gods but their great Creator.

We have still another class of aerial visitants, which amuse us much. These are kites in the form of angels, and as large as a child of some years old. But I must send a specimen to the city. They are some of them very fine, and beautifully finished, and when seen flying over the heads of the "children of the sun," one might almost fancy this to be indeed the Celestial Empire. We might load a ship with curiosities, which are very cheap here, and would be very valuable at home; but the freight, I am informed, is very great. I think, however, we can arrange to send some things, which will please and amuse. Mr. C. expects to be able to send you something by the "Houqua," which is expected here soon. How glad we shall be to visit our old ocean-home. When we hear the other missionaries tell the trials of their passage, we feel that we have much to be thankful for, that our passage to this Empire was providentially accomplished on that ship. We also had a good ship and officers up the coast. I suppose you have long since learned, that a ship in company with us, and which we spoke on the morning of that dreadful day of the typhoon, has never been heard of since. It brought out the mail, was considered a fine sailer, and our Heavenly Father only knows why we were hindered from taking passage on that ship, which we should certainly have labored to do had we known of its sailing in time to do so.

BE ALWAYS GIVING.

The sun gives ever; so the earth—
What it can give so much 'tis worth.
The ocean gives in many ways—
Gives baths, gives fishes, rivers, bays;
So too, the air, it gives us breath,
When it stops giving, comes in death.
Give, give, be always giving,
Who gives not, is not living;
The more you give,
The more you live.

God's love hath in us wealth unheaped,
Only by giving it is reaped;
The body withers, and the mind,
If pent in by a selfish rind.
Give strength, give thought, give deeds, give pelf,
Give love, give tears, and give thyself.
Give, give, be always giving,
Who gives not, is not living;
The more we give,
The more we live.

DEATH OF CROMWELL.

In the intervals of his suffering, he spoke incessantly of the goodness of God—and forgetting himself, in his anxiety for the Church, prayed—"Lord, though I am a miserable, wretched creature, I am in covenant with Thee through grace. And I may—I will come to Thee for thy people. Thou hast made me, though very unworthy, a mean instrument to do them good and Thee service; and many of them have set too high a value upon me, though others would wish and would be glad of my death—Lord, however Thou dost dispose of me, continue to go on and do good for them. Give them consistency of judgment, one heart, and mutual love; and go on to deliver them, and with the work of reformation; and make the name of Christ glorious in the world. Teach those who look too much on thy instruments, to depend more upon Thyself. Pardon such as desire to trample upon the dust of a poor worm, for they are Thy people, too. And pardon the folly of this short prayer; even for Christ's sake. And give us a good night, if it be Thy pleasure. Amen." At length the last night came, which was to usher in his fortunate day. The 3d of September, the anniversary of Dunbar, and of Marston, came amid wind and storm. In this solemn hour for England, strong hearts were every where beseeching heaven to spare the Protector. But the King of kings had issued his decree; and the spirit that had endured and toiled so long, was already gathering its pinions for eternity. "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God," broke thrice from his pallid lips, and then he fell, in solemn faith, on the covenant of grace. His breath became difficult and thick; but amid the pauses of the storm, he was heard murmuring, "Truly God is good; indeed He is; He will not ——" his tongue failed him; but, says an eye-witness, "I apprehend it was, 'He will not leave me.'" Again and again, there escaped from the ever-moving lips, the half-articulate words—"God is good; God is good." Once, with sudden energy, he exclaimed, "I would be willing to live, to be farther serviceable to God and his people; but my work is done. Yet God will be with his people." All night long, he murmured thus to himself of God; showing how perfect was his trust; how strong his faith. Once, as some drink was offered him, he said, "It is not my design to drink or to sleep; but my design is to make what haste I can to God."

While this scene was passing in that solemn chamber, all was wild and terrible without. Nature seemed to sympathize with the dying patriot and hero. The wind howled and roared around the palace; houses were unroofed; chimneys blown down; and trees, that had stood for half a century in the parks, were uptorn and strewn over the earth. The sea, too, was vexed; the waves smote, in ungovernable fury, the shores of England; and vessels lay stranded along the coasts of the Mediterranean. It was a night when there are,

"As they say,
Lamentings heard i' the air; strange screams of death,
And phosphorizing, with accents terrible
Of dire commotion, and confused events
Now hatched to the woeful time. * *
* * * * Some say the cattle
Were feverous and did shake."

But all was calm and serene around the dying bed of Cromwell. On that more than kingly brow, peace, like a white-winged dove, sat; and that voice which had turned the tide of so many battles, now murmured only prayers. Bonaparte, dying in the midst of just such a storm, shouted, "Tete d'armee," as his glaring eye fell once more on the heads of his mighty columns disappearing in the smoke of battle; but Cromwell took a noble departure. The storm and uproar without, brought no din of arms to his dying ear—not in the delirium of battle did his soul burst away; but, with his eye fixed steadfastly on the "eternal kingdom," and his strong heart sweetly stayed on the promise of a faithful God, he moved from the shores of time, and sank from sight for ever.

He died at three o'clock that day—on the very day, which, eight years before, saw his sword flashing over the tumultuous field of Dunbar—the same which, seven years previous, heard him shouting on the ramparts of Worcester. But this was the last and most terrible battle of all; yet he came off victorious; and triumphing over his last enemy, death, passed into that serene world, where the sound of battle never comes, and the hatred and violence of men never disturb. ### CARRYING A KNAPSACK.

When Dr. Cheever made the tour of Mont Blanc, he borrowed a military knapsack, and deposited in it such articles of clothing as he thought indispensable for his journey. With his knapsack on his shoulders, a long Alpen stock shod with iron in his hand, and a small edition of Paul's epistle to the Romans in his waistcoat pocket, he started off, he tells us, feeling very independent. His experience of the convenience and inconvenience of this sort of equipage, leads him to say, 'There is one good thing in carrying your own knapsack; when you throw it off at evening you feel so light from the relief, that your other fatigues are quite forgotten; you could almost set out for another day's walk. It seems as though some heavenly power had put wings to your shoulders. I do not expect, by this argument, to persuade any man to walk all day with a weary fardel on his back; it would be something like getting sick in order to enjoy the pleasure of convalescence; but certainly, if one feels compelled to walk under a burden, what I have mentioned is some consolation and encouragement. Just so, it may be, that those who have the heaviest burdens to bear through life, will be the lighter for them when they lay them at evening in the grave. Certainly they will, if the burdens were borne for Christ, if they came upon the shoulders in his service, or if they were carried in sweet, cheerful submission to him, because he laid them there. Men will be lighter and brighter for all such burdens for ever and ever; lighter and brighter in their path of glory and happiness through eternity, than those whose knapsack of evils was borne for them by others, or who had none to bear for Christ. Yes, burdened pilgrim, this light affliction worketh an exceeding and eternal weight of glory.'

A MYSTERIOUS HEARER.

A clergyman in the county of Tyrone had, for some weeks, observed a little ragged boy come every Sunday, and place himself in the centre of the aisle, directly opposite the pulpit, where he seemed exceedingly attentive to the service. He was desirous of knowing who the child was, and for this purpose hastened out, after the sermon, several times, but never could see him, as he vanished the moment service was over, and no one knew whence he came, or anything about him. At length the boy was missed from his usual situation in the church, for some weeks. At this time a man called on the minister, and told him a person very ill was desirous of seeing him; but added, "I am really ashamed to ask you to go so far; but it is a child of mine, and he refuses to have any one but you; he is altogether an extraordinary boy, and talks a great deal about things that I do not understand." The clergyman promised to go, and went, though the rain poured down in torrents, and he had six miles of rugged mountain country to pass. On arriving where he was directed, he saw a most wretched cabin indeed, and the man he had seen in the morning was waiting at the door. He was shown in, and found the inside of the hovel as miserable as the outside. In the corner, on a little straw, he beheld a person stretched out, whom he recognized as the little boy who had so regularly attended his church. As he approached the wretched bed, the child raised himself up, and stretching forth his arms, said, "His own right hand hath gotten him the victory"—Psa. 98 : 1—and immediately expired!

VICISSITUDE.

William Elliot, a native of London, passed through many changes of situation during life, and died at the advanced age of ninety-seven years. He experienced many a vicissitude, and tried many a shifting method of obtaining worldly happiness, under the influence of the carnal principles and adventurous spirit which characterize a large portion of civilized society. In the early part of his life, he was an eminent distiller, but he suffered losses, and eventually became a bankrupt. He next went to sea, expecting to push his way by boldness and enterprise; and, having fallen into the hands of pirates, he escaped to an uninhabited island, where he spent five years in solitude, subsisting upon the spontaneous productions of the climate. After a series of adventures, he succeeded in getting back to his native land, and commenced to traverse the country as a strolling player. Tiring of his new occupation, he next kept a lottery office, and afterwards practiced as a quack physician; and, having failed to obtain what he though sufficient encouragement, he then became a horse-dealer, and speculated in the state-lottery, eventually drawing a prize of ten thousand pounds. He at length possessed what he esteemed a fair fortune, and abandoned himself to fashionable pleasures; but, actuated by an uncontrolled love of speculation, he addicted himself, at first fashionably, and afterwards professionally, to the practice of gaming; and he became speedily reduced to extreme indigence, and was arrested for debt, and shut up during many years, in Fleet prison. After re-acquiring liberty, for which he was indebted to the insolvent Act, he commenced to labor as a common porter. His strength, however, was not long in failing him, and he took up the occupation of a street-beggar and spent in it the concluding years of his life. Strangely, as some persons may think, yet naturally, and almost as a natural result of the elements which composed his character, he declared that of all the situations he had filled, of all the pursuits in which he ever engaged, that of a common beggar yielded him the greatest amount of happiness.

THE SINNER OF FOURSCORE.

I was about to take my leave, for a season, of a friend and benefactor, who was nearly fourscore years of age. The conversation, as we drew near the place where I was to take the steamboat, took a religious turn, though I did not succeed in rendering it as personal as was desirable. The boat was in sight as we reached the wharf. "I hope," said I, "that I shall see you again in the spring."

"It is not likely," said he, "that I shall be living in the spring."

"Have you no hope that you are a Christian?" said I, perhaps too abruptly, but not without emotion.

The tears rolled down his cheeks, and with some hesitation he said, "No, I don't know that I have any."

For a moment I was too much affected by this painful confession to be able to speak.

"Don't you think," said he, wiping the tears from his cheek with the back of his toil-hardened hand, "that there are some who seek for religion all their days and never find it?"

I knew that he referred to himself. During his whole life, he had been thoughtful, and more or less interested on the subject of religion. I suspected that he thought it was not altogether owing to himself that he was not a Christian. "Have you ever sought for religion as earnestly as you have sought for property?"

"No, I do not know as I have."

"Can you expect to gain eternal life and glory, with less earnestness of effort than it cost you to gain your farm?"

He shook his head. The boat was at the wharf. I bade him farewell, and was borne away. I watched him standing on the wharf, and my heart ached for the aged sinner, so near to death's door, and yet not willing to seek with the earnestness which is necessary in order to find.

THE BROKEN VOW.

Some years ago, a poor lad came to London, in search of a situation as errand boy; he made many unsuccessful applications, and was on the eve of returning to his parents, when a gentleman, being prepossessed by his appearance, took him into his employment, and after a few months, bound him apprentice. He so conducted himself during his apprenticeship, as to gain the esteem of every one who knew him; and after he had served his time, his master advanced a capital for him to commence business. He retired to his closet with a heart glowing with gratitude to his Maker for His goodness, and there solemnly vowed that he would devote a tenth part of his annual income to the service of God. The first year his donation amounted to ten pounds, which he gave cheerfully, and continued to do so till it amounted to £500. He then thought that was a great deal of money to give, and that he need not be so particular as to the exact amount. That year he lost a ship and cargo to the amount of £15,000, by a storm! This caused him to repent, and he again commenced his contributions with a resolution never to retract; he was more successful every year, and at length retired. He then devoted a tenth part of his income for several years, till he became acquainted with a party of worldly men, who, by degrees drew him aside from God; he discontinued his donations, and made large speculations, lost every thing, and became almost as poor as when he first arrived in London as an errand boy. "There is," saith Solomon, "that scattereth and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty."

POWER OF A GOOD MAN'S LIFE.

The beauty of a holy life constitutes the most eloquent and effective pursuasive to religion, which one human being can address to another. We have many ways of doing good to our fellow creatures; but none so efficacious as leading a virtuous, upright, and well-ordered life. There is an energy of moral suasion in a good man's life, passing the highest efforts of the orator's genius. The seen but silent beauty of holiness, speaks more eloquently of God and duty than the tongues of men and angels. Let parents remember this. The best inheritance a parent can bequeath to a child is a virtuous example, a legacy of hallowed remembrances and associations. The beauty of holiness beaming through the life of a loved relative or friend, is more effectual to strengthen such as do stand in virtue's ways, and raise up those that are bowed down, than precept, command, entreaty or warning. Christianity itself, I believe, owes by far the greater part of its moral power, not to the precepts or parables of Christ, but to his own character. The beauty of that holiness which is enshrined in the four brief biographies of the Man of Nazareth, has done more, and will do more, to regenerate the world, and bring in an everlasting righteousness, than all the other agencies put together. It has done more to spread his religion in the world than all that has ever been preached or written on the evidences of Christianity. [Chalmers.

WHAT ARE THE SABBATH-KEEPERS OF PENNSYLVANIA TO DO?

What are the Seventh-day Baptists in Pennsylvania to do under the proscription, the disablement, imposed upon them, forever, in that State, by the recent decision of the Supreme Court, affirming the constitutionality of the Sunday law of 1794?—is a serious, most momentous question, which propounds itself to every oppressed believer. The law not only makes invidious distinctions between the compeers of the same republican family, and gives a "preference" to the Sunday sect, but imposes a barrier to the "free exercise"—the promulgation—and the reception of the pure, unadulterated truth of the Bible, by imposing on those who follow its plain, explicit injunctions, (and in virtue of which, ought, certainly, to enjoy exemption from the operation of such a law,) a sacrifice of time, an additional sacrifice of one-sixth of their precious time, to do homage to a day, which neither they, nor the Scriptures, regard as sacred, holy time, and which no other denomination has to submit to. It is an infamous deprivation of civil rights, a flagrant robbery, independent of elevating a religious institution over the Bible and over our consciences. To demand another sixth of their time in addition to that required and cheerfully and conscientiously yielded to their Maker, to sacrifice to the prejudices of others, is an iniquitous and unwarrantable usurpation, not to be tolerated under any truly republican, constitutional government. It stultifies it completely.

My German Seventh-day Brethren have always professed their determination, in case of failure before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, to carry up their case to the highest tribunal of the land, the Supreme Court of the United States; and they would gladly embrace the opportunity, were it practicable; but which, in the opinion of the writer, (Mr. Stevens being absent from home to confer with,) we are precluded, by the State Court having decided the question solely on the ground of its being a "civil regulation." Had they affirmed the law, as a religious institution, we might have access to that tribunal; but under the circumstances, I cannot see how the Supreme Court of the United States can interfere with the civil regulations of a State. State sovereignty is competent to her own internal police; and as the Supreme Court has shorn the statute in question of all religious pretensions, and affirmed it as a mere "civil regulation," to be changed to any day of the week the majority may elect, we cannot, now, see how it can be entertained for adjudication by the Federal Court. However, on Mr. Stevens' return from New England, where he is now sojourning for a short season, I shall consult him on this point, and announce the result, if he can devise any mode, which promises success, of getting it up to that dignified tribunal.

What, then, are Sabbath-keepers in Pennsylvania to do? Are they called upon to set their faces against this injustice, and do despite to the law of the land, by disregarding the prohibitions of the statute, and continuing to labor as heretofore? By no means. So long as the statute was imposed and enforced as a religious institution, we were called upon to protest against it, and to defy it; but as we appealed to the highest tribunal of the State, and cannot, in all probability, reach the Supreme Court of the United States, we, as good citizens, a character which we have ever sustained, are called upon to submit to the iniquity for a time; in the end, I trust, to glorify the Lord of the Sabbath, and his own hallowed, sanctified day; and in the mean time seek redress from the law-making and law-repealing power. While I regarded the Sunday law of 1794 as an infringement on our constitutional rights and immunities—having respect to a religious institution that I could not venerate or regard as having the slightest claims to sacredness, coercing us to respect it, I resisted it in toto, and on all occasions dissuaded my brethren from going to Legislative Halls to beg for what I considered belonged to them as a right; but now, as the statute is stripped of all its religious character, and is asserted, by the highest authority in the State, to exist only as a civil institution, we can, without any compromise of principle, without any inconsistency, ask for a modification of the law, so as to afford us, who regard the true rest-day unto the Lord, exemption from its operation. To address a memorial to the next Legislature, representing, fully, the injury it inflicts on our rights; show what provision most of the other States of the Union have made for Sabbath-keepers, by extracts from their laws, not only exempting them from fines and penalties for laboring on the first day, but serving as witnesses and as jurors, and interdicting the serving of any civil process on them, on the seventh day, that our conscientious right to worship the Lord on the Heaven-appointed day, (which we conscientiously believe is the time required of us,) should not be disturbed, nor our devotions be molested. Let a full representation of this matter be laid before our law-makers. Let our wrongs be strongly portrayed, and an appeal to the justice of the Legislature be urged and urged, and urged again, and justice, though tardy, may be meeted out unto us. The Supreme Court, though they could make no such recommendation, incidentally gave one or two intimations to that purport; and had it been within their province to amend the law and make provision for oppressed Sabbath-keepers, I have no doubt that provision would have been cheerfully awarded to them—and that, if it would not have been stepping out of the record, they would have, unhesitatingly, recommended a revision and amendment. But their power, and their province, is, simply, to interpret the law—not to make or alter it.

We have always maintained, that the secular power has no right to establish and enforce any day of religious rest. We should never dream of imposing any one, even the honored, honored of the Lord, the seventh day, on any community by a human enactment. Persuading the majority that the seventh day is the true, and the only true Sabbath of the Bible, would not authorize any delegated body to enforce its observance by the civil power. That belongs to God alone. It is his province to vindicate his own law; and this he will most assuredly do, in his own time and in his own way. "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord, I will repay." While we, as a people, are decidedly opposed to invoking the secular power, to enforce the observance of any day as the Sabbath—(for we do not consider that any human law can confer any sacredness whatever on any day, nor that any authority short of the Almighty can appoint, alter, or amend any Heaven-appointed institution)—yet we may resort to "the powers that be," to seek redress from injuries, inflicted by the civil power, and ask exemption from unequal, onerous laws. Sabbath-keepers have never been among the instigators of any such "blue laws;" neither have they ever endeavored, as has sometimes been charged upon them, from their opposition to the oppressive Sunday laws, "to introduce a state of social and civil discord." They never troubled the public, at any time, on this subject, but passed on "in the even tenor of their way," until assaulted and persecuted under the existing Sunday law. In seeking redress, in any of the States, they never petitioned to have all laws repealed, but simply asked for exemption from the operation of invidious and oppressive laws—(in virtue of being true Sabbath-keepers)—imposed, alike, on them and non-observers of any day unto the Lord. They merely asked to be released from being obliged to yield two-sevenths of their time as rest-days, whilst others yield but one. Restore unto us our rights, and we shall never molest others in the enjoyment of their immunities, nor encourage any one to desecrate all days. We ask nothing that we have not been willing, at all times, to concede to others; and this we will continue to demand. Having the "thus saith the Lord" for our practice, we will not, we cannot be silenced, until justice is rendered unto us; and while secular fetters shackle our souls, we must protest, and should protest against the iniquity until we receive the consideration at the hands of the law-making power, we are entitled to as freemen, and as conscientious and faithful Sabbath-keepers.

Should they fail in this effort, then let them make an application, under a strong representation of being deprived of equal rights and religious immunities, to the Legislature, asking the passage of an Act to authorize them to make sale of their estates at Ephrata and Snowhill, which are held in trust under Acts of Incorporation, with the intent of seeking a home, a Goshen, in some other State, where they may enjoy equal rights and religious immunities, of which they have been deprived in the land of Penn; and, thus, let the world abroad behold the opprobrium, the recorded odium of having driven a religious, Christian church, of good report for upwards of one century and a quarter, out of their borders, by imposing, and persisting in imposing, unequal laws and onerous sacrifices on freemen of the commonwealth.

Much as we love the land of our nativity, Pennsylvania, when her Legislature so far forgets her power, her legitimate power, as to impose such unequal, oppressive restrictions, on a portion of her citizens, and her highest tribunal, under a specious figment, confirms the iniquitous Act, it is not humility and becoming obedience to "the powers that be," to submit to the tyranny thus wantonly exercised; but it is pusillanimity, and a want of a proper appreciation of and devotion to the cause of truth, to yield tacitly to such iniquitous burdens. The Scriptures afford many instances of persons, families, and whole tribes, for wise and good ends, having to fly their own beloved country—to forsake the land of their fathers—the hearths and graves of their kindred—to expatriate themselves—to promote the purposes of their Father in Heaven. Thus was it with our forefathers in leaving their native shrines, on the iron-glebe of despotic Europe, in the seventeenth century, to seek an asylum in the wilds of America.

——"Good Heaven! what sorrows gloom'd the parting day,
That call'd them from their native walks away:
When the poor exiles, every pleasure past,
Hung round their bowers, and look'd their last,
And took a long farewell, and wished in vain,
For seats like these beyond the western main:
And shuddering still to face the distant deep,
Return'd and wept, and still return'd to weep!"

Such scenes and such privations did our forefathers endure for our sakes; and now, as we are despoiled of our rights, our heritage in this land of vaunted freedom and equal rights, it likewise becomes us to act for future generations. Unpleasant as such an enterprise may appear, yet in this extremity, should it occur, as a dernier alternative, we should regard it but as in the line of our duty, to protest manfully, boldly, against the iniquities of oppression, and be ready, at any cost, to testify to the integrity of God's Truth, and to maintain his hallowed institutions, to forsake every thing to uphold the pure, unrestrained worship of the living God, and in resisting sacrifice to Baal. In some, if not all of the New England States, the conscientious rights and immunities of Sabbath-keepers are provided for, in their Sunday laws. In the Empire State, New York, the same principle is recognized and incorporated in the statute; and provision is likewise made to secure all observers of the seventh day from being molested by any process of law, or having to serve as witness or juror. New Jersey makes every provision in her Sunday statute for the seventh-day people, with but one restriction; namely, that of exposing goods for sale on the first day of the week; while Ohio, glorious Ohio, yields full equality of rights, privileges, and immunities to all conscientious, Sabbath-keepers, to the fullest extent—withholding no privilege whatever from them on that day—the first day of the week.

Who, then, would not be willing to make the sacrifice of home, ever dear home, the fire-sides and graves of our kindred, to shake off the fetters imposed upon our free spirits—the liberty wherewith the Gospel has made us free—to remove the impediments to the free promulgation and the free reception, without let or hindrance, of our holy religion and the heaven-born, heaven-appointed, heaven-blessed institutions it has been our heritage, heretofore, to possess unmolested—to breathe a free, unrestricted air, uncontaminated with pagan poison—the restrictions of Sunday enactments.

Whatever determination may be arrived at in the premises, one thing is certain and imperative. We are to prove ourselves faithful to our calling, to our Lord and Master, and not to forsake his cause under any contingency. We are not to yield the celebration of the true Sabbath for any cause, not even life; but in the words of Balaam, though a wicked man, yet as the Scriptures often make the wrath of man to praise his Maker, and even their wickedness to seal instruction upon our lips, every true Sabbath-keeper can and must take up his language: "If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord to do more or less." We are, therefore, not from any considerations to yield the true Sabbath, from any inconvenience it may subject us to, nor recognize the assumed sacredness of Constantine's day, by any acts of worship, to distinguish it from any other day of the week. If we must cease from actual labor, out of doors, we may rest, or rather, make it a day for the improvement of the mind; but never recognize it by any special religious acts, lest weaker brethren may slide into it from considerations of expediency and mistaken example, and, hereafter, do the cause of truth they are now called upon in the Providence of God to testify to, much damage. If it be a trial, a sore trial, we must take up the cross, and thank God that we are not left to prove our fealty to Him and His institutions, by having to be cast, like Shadrach, Meshech, and Abednego, into the fiery furnace. We are truly in a furnace—it is for wise purposes—to prove us—to purify us—to glorify God's abused institution. Let us be true to ourselves, but above all, be true to Him who is to be our Judge in the last day. Though we have met with a discomfiture, we are not subdued—we must ever remain, even when down-trodden, witnesses and champions for the truth—the unmutilated truth of God, the Majesty of heaven and earth—in opposition to "the commandments of men." We must grasp, anew, the standard of truth, and battle, and even die, if called upon, for the truth's sake. Though the oppressor has prevailed, we are not conquered, nor going to be conquered. There is still a work for Sabbath keepers to do—to proclaim the truth—to cry aloud and spare not. In the language of Milton:—

"Much remains
To conquer still; peace hath her victories
No less renown'd than war: new foes arise,
Threatening to bind our souls with secular chains."

This victory is to be gained by proclaiming in the streets, the high-ways, and the by-ways, the unmutilated truth of the Almighty, in regard to His holy day. And taking the suggestion from the intolerant Judge on the Supreme Bench, in the same manner that I have done Balaam's, it would be an appropriate sermon, for all Sabbath-keepers to proclaim, in all places, and on all occasions, Jonah-like—"The Almighty has been dethroned!—the Almighty has been dethroned!!—the Almighty has been dethroned!!!" This truth we are called upon to testify to. Let us prove ourselves "valiant for the truth," and never cease to proclaim on the housetops, the overthrow of God's holy institution, and the proscription of his followers, in the land of Penn. ## DREADFUL "SABBATH ACCIDENT."

Papers from Portland, Me., inform us that on the afternoon of Saturday, July 22d, the wife and three children of Mr. Wm. I. Smith, and four children of Mr. John Whyley—eight persons in all—were drowned in Portland Harbor by the upsetting of a boat in which they were taking a pleasure excursion. Mr. Smith saved himself by clinging to the mast; and Mr. Stephenson, who had charge of the boat, saved himself by swimming to an adjoining ledge. Mr. Whyley, who was watching for the return of his little ones when the fearful news reached him, has been in a state of delirium almost all the time since.

If this accident had occurred on a Sunday, it would no doubt have been trumpeted throughout the country as a solemn warning against taking pleasure excursions on that day, and a striking instance of God's interposition to punish the desecration of it. But it occurred on the Sabbath, instead of a Sunday, and hence no particular notice is taken of it, and no newspaper sermons are delivered on the occasion. For our part, we are not accustomed to regard God as employing himself on the Sabbath, much more than on other days, in capsizing sail-boats and smashing railroad cars; and we are not disposed, therefore, to write a sabbatic homily in view of this fact. We beg leave to suggest, however, to those who are in the habit of gathering up what they call "Sabbath Accidents," that this one may deserve their attention quite as well as a majority of those to which their attention is given, and we think it would be especially appropriate for them to explain it so as not to impair the argument which they often frame in favor of the Sunday.

Church Wealth in Austria.—The London News says: "The primate of Hungary is the richest churchman in Christendom. His principality is magnificent, £90,000 a year. His palace of Gran, on the banks of the Danube, combines the dignity of feudal power with the various attractions of an educated court. The Austrian Prince, Swartzenbourg, Cardinal Archbishop of Ratisbonne, though the youngest member of the sacred college, is remarkable, not merely for his high birth, but for his vigorous and untiring visits to the poor, the sick, and the hospitals. The primate of Croatia is the first man in the country, and ranks next after the Kaiser himself; he has three regiments of infantry of his own body guard, and holds his court in the fortress of Agram, (which is called Zography.) When he received the Duchess of Berri in his ecclesiastical stronghold, not Solomon in all his glory, welcoming the Queen of Sheba, showed more magnificence. Then there are the only rich Abbeys of the Benedictine order now extant in Christendom protected by Austria. There is the splendid and most richly endowed monastery of Loike, overlooking the Danube, and full of treasure, of art, and literature; there are in Hungary and Bohemia various other munificent establishments.

Penny-a-week in the Presbyterian Church of Ireland.—Dr. Morgan, in his opening sermon before the Synod of Belfast, remarked that the Presbyterian church had, during the last quarter of a century, nearly doubled the number of her churches. She had expended in their erection about £100,000; and while doing so, it was gratifying to know that at the same time she had prosecuted, with considerable spirit and zeal, the work of missions; £10,000 a year having been devoted to carry out the Home, Foreign, and Jewish schemes; and a plan having at the last Assembly been arranged for securing to our countrymen in the British colonies the benefits of a preached Gospel. In order that much more might be done, the reverend Doctor suggested the carrying out, in an energetic manner, of the principles of individual effort and individual responsibility, One penny a week from each communicant in the Presbyterian church in Ireland would, he said, produce £20,000 a year—a sum which would enable the church to send out many more laborers into those fields of the world which now, there is reason to be thankful, are white for the harvest.

Returned from the War.—The New York Volunteers who have outlived the perils of a Mexican campaign, and returned to this city, were welcomed by a great procession, sundry speeches, and a silver medal each, on fifth-day last. As they passed through the streets, preceded by various independent military companies, we could not help being struck with the contrast between the hale and hearty men who wear their plumes at home, and those gaunt and sun-burnt men who have been in actual service. There was of course a great deal of hurrahing and waving of handkerchiefs among the spectators of the procession, in which we confess our inability to take part. Glad as we were that the Mexicans had not killed them all, but left some to return and engage in better business, the sight of them was to us a most sad and sickening one.

A Shower of Titles.—At the Commencement of Union College, which took place last week, the degree of LL.D. was conferred on S. Wells Williams, author of "The Middle Kingdom." The degree of D.D. on Rev. Gideon N. Judd, of Catskill; Rev. Alex. McNab, President of Victoria College, Canada West; Rev. Ebenezer Halley, of Troy; Rev. Prof. Kendrick, of Madison University; Rev. Herman Hooker, of Philadelphia. The honorary degree of A.M. was conferred on Hon. Zadock Pratt, of Prattsville; and James R. Irish, President of the DeRuyter Institute. That of A.B. on William Wrightson, of the Albany Academy.

Heterogeneous Cargo.—It is said that a brig which recently sailed from Providence for Africa, took out ten missionaries, two hundred and fifty-six hogsheads of New England rum, and a a quantity of powder and muskets. This is a mournful fact to record, especially if the accounts of rum's doings in that country are to be received without qualification. Rev. J. L. Wilson, from South Africa, says that rum is probably doing more to afflict that unhappy country than even "the slave trade and all the bloody skirmishes in its train." If this opinion is well founded, it may be seriously questioned whether the arrival of that ship's cargo will really benefit the afflicted land.

Re-baptizing.—The Classis of Bergen, N. J., belonging to the Reformed Protestant Dutch church, has recently taken a position which is worthy of note. A German Evangelical church was organized at Newark, N. J. The church called as its pastor a man who had formerly been a Roman Catholic priest. He presented his testimonials to the Classis. After a full discussion, it was resolved, that they must begin de novo. They could not recognize him as a minister, nor even as a baptized person. He was accordingly baptized (or sprinkled) by the President of the Classis, and licensed, and was in due season to be ordained.

Sunday Shaving in Philadelphia.—The Philadelphia correspondent of the New York Tribune says efforts have been made in that city to close the barbers' shops, on the ground that the work "desecrates the Sabbath." Alderman Mitchell has dismissed the complaint, on the ground that the work was one of necessity, and therefore not punishable under the law; that cleanliness was a duty which every citizen owed to society; and if a man could not shave himself, the individual employed by him was no more liable than a person who cropped his own beard.

Conversion of a Brahmin.—The Rev. Henry Ballantine, of the Ahmednuggur Mission, says—in a letter dated March 25th—that "on the 12th inst., a young man of the Brahmin caste, named Dejeba, was baptized and received into the church. He has long been in our employment as a school teacher; and for two years past he has at varioas times asked for baptism."

Was it Sabbath-breaking?—The Pittsburg Chronicle of July 3d says that on Sunday afternoon about 5 o'clock, Messrs. Carey and Ryan, were instantly killed by lightning, as they were returning to their residence in Birmingham. They had been teaching at the Sunday School attached to St. Paul's Church. One of the junior brothers, who was between them, escaped unhurt.

HOW IT WORKS.

The Sunday coercionists, emboldened by the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, had some of the knights of the razor and scissors, in the City of Brotherly Love, arraigned last week, for profaning the sacredness of the "civil rest-day" in exercising their vocation, not having the fear of man before them, nor having any regard for humanly-appointed "holy time." The Magistrate, however, set the diabolical perpetrators at liberty, and thus declared to the world, that many things which have been done, may be done again; in which we see indications of public sentiment, that the screws have been screwed too tight, and are beginning to spring. So mote it be, until those who act from pure conscientious feelings in the matter have extended to them the same consideration. W. M. F.

The Case of the Barbers.—Yesterday, two persons belonging to the trade of barbers were heard before Alderman Mitchell, on a complaint for desecrating the Sabbath in exercising their vocation on that day. After hearing the testimony, the magistrate decided that the work performed was one of necessity, and was not punishable under the act of Assembly; that cleanliness was an important duty enjoined by society, and if a man could not perform the operation of shaving himself, the individual employed to do it for him was no more liable than he would be, if he were charged with an infraction of the law. The parties were accordingly discharged. [Philadelphia Ledger.

One of the Results.—Sunday traveling has recently been abolished on the railroad between Albany and Schenectady. A correspondent of the New York Express says it has been done through the influence of E. C. Delavan, and that the wicked think it is to keep travelers over Sunday in the Delavan House at Albany. Be that as it may, the writer says that "to be more wicked, the travelers catch up with hackney coaches, omnibuses, wagons, and all sorts of vehicles, to take them up to Schenectady on a Sunday, when the Utica railroad takes them one way, and the Saratoga railroad another. Thus, some hundred horses or more, with half as many drivers, are kept prancing and capering through the streets of Albany and Schenectady, when, if the railroad was worked, there would be sinning only by the locomotive the engineer, and two or three others. This question of Sunday travel has many sides to it. If all the railroads would stop, the case would be a little different. But then it would be necessary to stop the horses and the vehicles; for at present, twenty people are moving others between Albany and Schenectady, where one would be at work if the railroad was in motion. Travelers, cut off from a given point, scold and sin, in hard words, not a little. Churches have no solace for ill-natured travelers arrested away from home."

Prize Essays by Working Men.—An Edinburg paper mentions a fact highly creditable to the education and principles of working men in Scotland. In December last, a benevolent and pious gentleman in Edinburgh, proposed to give prizes of £25, £15, and £10 for the first best, second best, and third best essays on the temporal advantages to the laboring classes. The competitors were to be working men in the strictest sense of the expression, the essays brief, and sent in on or before the 30th of March, 1848. Incredible as it may seem, the number of working men—men engaged at some kind of handicraft from morning to night—who have entered the list on this occasion, is no less than nine hundred and fifty. Those who have had the privilege of glancing at this immense mass of Prize Essays by working men, speak of them as characterized by much accuracy of style, great argumentative power, and a general accuracy of just thought.

The Church-Site Question in Great Britain.—The exciting question about compelling refractory landlords to grant sites for the erection of churcoes where they are needed, seems to divide the friends of voluntaryism. The Free Church are in favor of compulsory law; the Congregationalists, headed by Dr. Lindsay Alexander, disclaim any desire to compel by legal enactments such a grant, and urge the use of moral means alone. The controversy takes a broad range, and involves highly important principles. Conducted in a kind spirit, it will tend to do good.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

The absorbing and almost exclusive subject under discussion in Congress last week, was the Bill reported by the Select Committee for establishing Territorial Governments in Oregon, New Mexico, and California, commonly called the Compromise Bill.

In the SENATE, it was debated all through the early part of the week, and the Wednesday night's session was continued until 7 1-2 o'clock Thursday morning, when the vote was taken, and the Bill passed, 33 being for it and 22 against it. This was regarded as a triumph of Southern views in the Senate.

In the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, the debate was very animated, and continued until Friday, when a motion was made to lay the Bill on the table, which passed by a vote of 112 to 97. A motion was then made to reconsider, which was lost by a vote of 114 to 96. This of course kills the Bill, and is regarded by the friends of Freedom and Free Soil as a great triumph.

The Senate has voted that Congress adjourn on the 14th of August—a proposition in which the House will undoubtedly concur.

LATER EUROPEAN NEWS.

The steamer Europa arrived at Boston July 27th, with European news to the 15th, the substance of which, as telegraphed to the New York Tribune, we give below.

In Ireland it is said that the crisis is approaching, and each party is girding itself for the conflict. The end of harvest has been looked forward to as the time for an outbreak, but the government has taken the alarm, is augmenting its forces, and has apprehended a considerable number of the leaders, among whom are Mr. Duffy of "The Nation," Mr. Martin of "The Felon," Messrs. O'Dougherty & Williams and Mr. Hoban of "The Tribune," Mr. Meagher, and others, who are to be tried for treason, felony, and sedition. These arrests have created a great excitement, which extends throughout Ireland, and among the Repealers and Chartists of England.

From England, we learn that the Queen's Ministers have abandoned the intention of permitting her to visit Ireland in the course of next month. The convicted Chartists of London have been sentenced to ten years imprisonment.

In Paris, another plot has been dicovered. A correspondent of the London Globe says that the men of the Ateliers Nationaux and the other turbulent workmen had resolved to make another attempt on the 14th, the day originally fixed upon for the five-sous banquet. It is now known that this was merely a pretext for getting together an immense body, most of whom were to carry arms secreted under their blouses, while others were, on the first signal of outbreak, to have proceeded to the depots of muskets and ammunition which were to have been made in the quarter three or four days before the intended meeting. It is said now that such of the projectors of this plot as had not been captured for the part that they took in the late insurrection, had for the last fortnight been organizing their forces for a final and desperate struggle. Fortunately, however, the entire plot has been discovered by the Government, and many of the intended chiefs arrested.

The London Times of July 15th says: "Notwithstanding an official announcement of the Government, that no danger of an outbreak existed, the Paris papers of yesterday show that much apprehension prevailed in the French Capital. All the political prisoners were moved on Thursday night from the prisons of Paris to the detached ports. Several escaped on the way. The National Guard and the garrison were under arms at the departure of our express, and cannon were planted at various points. Our correspondent expresses his conviction, nevertheless, that no movement of the disaffected would take place.

The following are samples of the reports in circulation: One is that a general murder of the members of the Assembly is intended, means being organized of executing this simultaneously at their respective places of abode; another is that an organized assault will be made on the boarding schools where young persons of one and the other sex are educated, that these shall be captured and kept as hostages, to be delivered up only on the payment of a ransom in money and the concession of such political measures as the insurgents may require. Other reported projects have for their object the blowing up of portions of the Capitol by means of gunpowder deposited in the quarters of the catacombs, sewer-pipes, cellars, and other excavations which already exist, beside excavations expressly executed for the purpose.

It is reported that Wallachia is in a state of revolution, and that the Prince has been executed by his subjects.

The news from Berlin is unsatisfactory. The Communists are endeavoring to incite to an insurrection, similar to that of Paris.

The three months' armistice between Prussia and Denmark has been confirmed (for the third time.) Peace is expected to supervene.

Mehemet Ali is represented to be insane.

Considerable disturbances have taken place in the neighborhood of Frankfort. Barricades were erected, and some loss of life took place.

In Italy the war is still carried on without vigor. No farther decissive impression has been made by Charles Albert.

Late information from Russia is not authentic, but 20,000 men are said to have entered Moldavia. The Cholera is frightfully on the increase.

Germany is still unsettled. The election of the Archduke John is causing the utmost excitement.

FIGHT BETWEEN A RHINOCEROS AND AN ELEPHANT.—The peaceful village of Galway was on Sunday (the 22d) thrown into a great excitement by a report that the huge Rhinoceros, belonging to Raymond & Waring's Menagerie, had broken loose from his cage and was committing terrible havoc among the cattle in that vicinity. It seems that some time during Saturday night, the Elephant Columbus, who is not of the most amiable disposition, amused himself by tearing off the strong iron bars from the cage in which the Rhinoceros was secured. Finding himself menaced, the Rhinoceros came from his cage and showed fight. He was no sooner on the ground than he received two or three heavy blows from the trunk of the Elephant upon his back which beat him to the earth, where he lay for some time as if dead. The Elephant then endeavored to finish him by trampling upon him, which the Rhinoceros evaded by jumping under the body of his powerful antagonist, in which position he gave the Elephant several upward thrusts with the prodigious horn that projects from the front of his head, which put the elephant hors du combat. The keepers finding it impossible to secure the infuriated beasts alone, called upon the neighbors for assistance, which was promptly given, and every effort made to prevent them from doing further mischief. In the meanwhile the Rhinosceros had got into the open fields, where he confined his operations to the frightning of a number of horses and cows that were at pasture, and then took to a neighboring swamp, there he luxuriated in his favorite recreation of bathing with the the same unconcern as if he had been wallowing among his own native marshes in Borneo.

Finding it impossible to capture him by means of traps and meshes, the proprietors at length came to the conclusion of dispatching him; and for this purpose procured a number of muskets. They might, however, as well have fired against the side of s stone wall, as his hide resisted the balls as effectually as if he had been encased in iron. Up to a late hour last evening they had not succeeded in taking him, although more than five hundred persons were engaged in the pursuit, and a large reward offered for his capture alive. The Elephant is so badly wounded that he is not expected to recover. [St. Johnsville Rep. Extra.

IMPORTANT FROM YUCATAN AND MEXICO.—A correspondent of the Charleston Courier, writing from New Orleans, July 22, says:—

The inhabitants of Yucatan have been successful in several engagements with the Indians. The Indians having suffered severely in killed and wounded, had in every case retired discomfited.

An arrival from Mexico brings advices from the capital to the 11th inst. An engagement had taken place between the Government troops, commanded by Bustamente, and the insurgents, under the lead of Paredes, in which the former were routed. The loss of Paredes is stated at 27 killed and 60 wounded. Jarauta is said to be among the severely wounded, and probably mortally so. The roads throughout the whole of Mexico are said to be infested with robbers, who were plundering all that came in their way.

Another arrival, bringing two days later intelligence, confirms the above account of the success of the insurgents, and announces that they will probably overturn the Government, and drive Herrera from power and dissolve the existing authorities. Bustamente is said to have lost 500 men in the conflict that had taken place.

FROM ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S.—By the arrival of the schooner Providence, Capt. Shank, from the Swedish island of St. Bartholomew, we learn that on the 5th of July the Governor was beset by some 500 persons who compelled him instantly to issue a proclamation giving freedom to all the slaves of the island. A regular insurrection took place in a few hours, and the whites dispatched a British steamer, then lying in port, to St. Johns, P. R., with an application for aid. She returned with 500 soldiers who were landed, and attacked the insurgents. After slaying about 100 the rebellion was subdued. The whites then took the power out of the hands of the Governor and instituted a Provisional Government for their own protection. One of the provisions of the decree issued by the Governor was, that all slaves should be set free on the instant, and that those who were disabled should be supported by their former masters. To this the whites strenuously objected, urging that if the slaves were set free, the Government, not they, was bound to protect them. [Tribune.

INTERESTING TO WIDOWS.—The Law Journal for July contains an eloquent opinion by Judge Lewis, delivered at the June term of the Common Pleas Court at Lancaster, Pa., on a case where a certain man devised to his widow all his property, 'provided she remain a widow during her life; but in case she should marry again, my will is, she shall leave the premises,' &c. The widow having married again, suit was brought by the heirs of the husband to recover the property. Judge Lewis decided that 'the condition in restraint of marriage is void, and the second marriage of the widow does not divest her estate'—'the principles of morality, the policy of the nation, and the doctrines of the common law, the law of nature, and law of God, unite in condemning as void the conditions attempted to be imposed by this testator upon his widow.'

REMARKABLE PRESENTIMENT OF DEATH.—A young lady of this city, says the Rochester Advertiser, highly esteemed and respected, who had been sick for some length of time, but was supposed to be almost convalescent, had a dream a few nights since, in which it appeared to her that she would die at 8 o'clock the same evening. On waking, she informed the family of her dream, and remained firmly impressed with the idea that she would die at the hour designated, and under that belief, called her brothers and sisters around her, giving them good advice with reference to the future. Strange to say, and remarkable as it may seem, on the approach of 8 o'clock, she manifested a calm resignation, and almost as the clock tolled the hour, her spirit took its flight! Thus she foretold, by a singular presentiment, the day and hour of her own death!

SUMMARY.

The workmen engaged in digging for the railroad bridge in Cranston, R. I., excavated, says the Providence Journal, a number of Indian skeletons. The bones appeared to be in a good state of preservation, but some of them soon crumbled on exposure to the air. A copper kettle and several bottles of singular shape were found with them. One of the skulls was broken, as if by a blow. It is thought that one of the skeletons belonged to a chief. The skull shows a superior intellectual development, and most of the articles buried were found near it.

The Chronotype says that the experiment of crossing the Hudson river at New York by telegraphic wires, encased with gutta percha and laid on the bed of the river, has proved completely successful. This brings New York in immediate connection with the South and West, and puts an end to the annoying delay caused by the necessity of sending and receiving all messages to and from Jersey City.

The Illinois papers bring an account of a deliberate murder in that State, of Dr. J. Dullenger, by Edwin H. Herrell, a lawyer. Cause—slander of Herrell's wife. The murderer was too conscientious to kill his victim on Sunday, having met him on that day and told him that if it was not Sunday he would kill him then, but he would do it the first opportunity after, and shot him from a covert the next morning.

Scotland only pays half a million a year to the income-tax fund, while England pays four millions; yet her free church can rise annually £350,000 for the advancement of Christianity, while wealthy England, in proportion to her abilities as compared with those of Scotland, does not raise one tithe of that sum.

The Sumter (S. C.) Banner, of Wednesday, states that an atrocious murder was committed by some runaway negroes on the person of M. J. ### MARRIED,

In Brookfield, N. Y., July 6th, by Eld. W. B. Maxson, Mr. NORRIS TARBELL and Miss EUNICE CLARKE, both of Brookfield.

OBITUARY.

DEATH OF MRS. RACHEL DUNN, WIDOW OF JOEL DUNN, of New Market, N. J.—In her we have one of those instances of longevity that are so rare at the present day. She was born in the vicinity where she lived and died, in October, 1753. At the age of eighteen, in 1771, she was married to Joel Dunn, six years her senior. He being a Seventh-day Baptist in principle, she immediately commenced the observance of the Sabbath with him, and worshiped with the congregation of Sabbath-keepers in Piscataway, under the pastoral care of his grandfather, Rev. Jonathan Dunham, who died in 1782. During the protracted war with Great Britain, they with their neighbors suffered many hardships and privations. The British army being encamped near where they lived, she, with her small children, and a number of neighboring women, removed to the upper part of the State, which was at that time almost a wilderness, for safety and protection, leaving her husband connected with the American army, and exposed to the dangers of war. But by the vigilance of the army under the command of General Washington, the British were driven from the place, and they were permitted to return to their homes, to enjoy the blessings of domestic life. From the records of the Church, we learn that with her husband she was baptized and united with the Church in 1786, Rev. Nathan Rogers, formerly of New London, Ct., being the Pastor at that time. At the time they professed faith in Christ, the Church was blessed with an extensive revival of religion, and an ingathering of many souls. She has lived to see all who were then worshipers in that congregation, finish their work, lay down their armor, and go home to rest, having been sixty-two years a member in fellowship. She was blessed with a numerous family of children, ten of whom lived to marry and raise families. About four years ago her mind began to fail, and although she was able to go about the house, and to recognize her husband and children, her intellect was much impaired. Three years ago the present month, her husband was removed by death, being ninety-eight years old. He appeared to be her last earthly stay and comforter, and the kindness of children could not make up the loss she had sustained. From that time her mind has been completely dethroned, she not even knowing her own children and her constant attendants. The most of the time, for the last year she has been lying in a quiet sleep. On the morning of the 21st of July, her spirit took its flight to realms unseen by us, but known and enjoyed by faith in Jesus Christ. She has yet living a number of respectable children, some of whom are quite aged. Her descendants now living number not far from two hundred and fifty. She has ever sustained the character of an amiable, kind, and benevolent neighbor, a loving mother, and a consistent Christian. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord." Her funeral was attended on the Sabbath by a numerous congregation. Thus have ended the days of Mrs Rachel Dunn, aged ninety-five years.

A DREAM OF SUMMER.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

Bland as the morning breath of June
The southwest breezes play;
And through its haze the winter noon
Seems warm as summer day.
The snow-plumed angel of the north,
Has dropped his icy spear;
Again the mossy earth looks forth,
Again the streams gush clear.

The fox his hill-side cell forsakes,
The muskrat leaves his nook,
The blue-bird in the meadow brakes,
Is singing with the brook.
'Bear up, O mother Nature!' cry
Bird, breeze and streamlet free,
'Our winter voices prophecy
Of summer days to thee.'

So in the winters of the soul,
By bitter blasts and drear,
O'erswept from memory's frozen pole,
Will sunny days appear.
Reviving Hope and Faith, they show
The soul its living powers,
And low beneath the winter's snow
Lie gems of summer flowers!

The night is mother of the day,
The winter of the spring,
And ever upon old decay
The greenest mosses cling;
Behind the cloud the starlight lurks,
Through showers the sunbeams fall;
For God, who loveth all his works,
Hath left his Hope with all!

HOW DO MEN GENERALLY GET THEIR WIVES.

Where do men usually discover the women who afterwards become their wives? is a question we have occasionally heard discussed; and the result invariably come to is worth mentioning to our young lady readers. Chance has much to do in the affair; but then there are important governing circumstances. It is certain that few men make a selection from ball-rooms, or any other places of public gaity; and nearly as few are influenced by what may be called showing off in the streets, or by any allurements of dress. Our conviction is, that 99 hundredths of all the finery with which women decorate, or load their persons, goes for nothing, as far as husband-catching is concerned. Where and how, then, do men find their wives? In the quiet homes of their parents and guardians—at the fireside, where the domestic graces and feelings are alone demonstrated. These are the charms which most surely attract the high as well as the humble. Against these all the finery and airs in the world sink into insignificance.

We shall illustrate this by an anecdote, which, though not new, will not be the worse for being again told. In the year 1773, Peter Burrell, Esq., of Buckingham, in Kent, whose strength was rapidly declining, was advised by his physicians to go to Spa for the recovery of his health. His daughters feared that those who had only motives entirely mercenary would not pay him that attention which he might expect from those who, from duty and affection united, would feel the greatest pleasure in ministering to his ease and comfort; they therefore resolved to accompany him. They proved that it was not a spirit of dissipation and gaiety that led them to Spa, for they were not to be seen in any gay and fashionable circles; they were never out of their father's company, and never stirred from home except to attend him, either to take the air, or to drink the waters; in a word, they lived the most recluse life in the midst of a town then the resort of the illustrious and fashionable personages of Europe.

This exemplary attention to their father procured these three amiable sisters the admiration of all the English at Spa, and was the cause of their elevation to that rank in life to which their merits gave them so just a title? They all were married to noblemen—one to the Earl of Beverly, another to the Duke of Hamilton, and afterwards to the Marquis of Exeter, and a third to the Duke of Northumberland. And it is justice to them to say, that they reflected honor on their rank, rather than derived any from it.

THE HAPPY MAN.

In walking down Second street, on my way to the Arsenal, I found a crack in my boot, and recollecting the old adage, "a stitch in time saves nine," I popped into the first cobbler's shop I found, to get it mended. Unlooked-for pleasures are generally most relished. I had no expectation of meeting with a philosophical cobbler. Pulling off my boot, I looked at the man. What an expressive forehead! What an expressive eye! There is truth in Physiognomy, exclaimed I to myself. That fellow's brains are not made of green peas! As he was fixing the boot, I thought of a man with capacities for intellectual pleasure and improvement, "lofty and lordly," wasting his whole existence, pent up in a small room, knocking away with his hammer, and bending from morning till night over a lap-stone and a piece of leather. I took another look at the man, and, while the glorious sun was rolling in his golden course, and all nature smiling in her most gorgeous and superb scenery, moving the gaze and filling the beholder with sublime feelings, here, said I to myself, sits a man perpetually straining his eyes to poke a hog's bristle through a little hole. What an employment for a man capable, if properly instructed, of measuring the distance to Mercury! It is impossible that he can be happy—he is out of his sphere. Just as he got the thread through the third hole, I spoke to him and said, "Your room is very small; are you happy here?" He answered with some energy, "Happy! Yes, as happy as the day is long, and would not exchange situations with the President. I don't interfere with politics; but I know all about them."

"But are you happy in your employment, confined all day in this small room?"

"Yes, certainly. The fact is, half of the world don't know how to be happy. I was for a while humbugged about happiness, but, sitting on my stool and reflecting seriously one day, I got the secret. I thought that to be happy you must be rich and great, and have an inconveniently large house, and a table groaning with every thing. But I soon found all that was stuff. I am happier here with my last and hammer, than thousands with their fine houses and splendid equipage, and have a great deal of enjoyment, in looking out of my little cabin, and laughing at the follies of the world. They don't see me, and it does them no harm. Between you and me, the world is busy pursuing mere shadows; one wants to be rich, another to get into office—never satisfied; but here am I, mending old shoes, contented with my lot and situation, and happier by far than a King. Indeed I am thankful that heaven in its wrath never made me a King, for it is poor business."

By this time my boot was ready, and wishing to prolong the conversation with a man who displayed so much real practical Philosophy, I said—

"Have you no distressing cares to vex you, no anxieties, no sleepless nights, no bills to meet, no pangs for yesterday, no fears for to-morrow?"

He stared at me a moment, and said, "No, none. The only cares which I have are comforts. I have a wife, the best in the world, and two children, which are comforts for any man to enjoy. As to bills, I have none to meet. I never buy on credit, and never buy what I do not really need. As for the fears of to-morrow, I have no fears, but trust in a kind and overruling Providence, believing that sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof, and resignation to Providence to be the truest Philosophy."

What a noble fellow, said I, to mend a crack in a boot! Himself a piece of noble workmanship! I felt inwardly the truth of the saying, "contentment is a kingdom;" and after I left my philosophical cobbler, I thought much about him, and am satisfied that his philosophy was sound, and that mankind in general have yet to learn the secret of being happy. His situation in life is obscure, but

> Honor and fame from no condition rise;
> Act well your part, there all the honor lies.

"Contentment is a kingdom;" would that the whole human family realized this sentiment more fully, and practiced many of the maxims of the cobbler—such as never to buy on credit, and never to buy what they do not need, and trust more to our Heavenly Father, who has promised to give us whatsoever we ask in his name. ## BLOOD OF AN INEBRIATE.

Ever since the commencement of the temperance cause, great aid has been given to its advance by the facts and statistics bearing upon the subject which have come under the cognizance of the medical profession. The testimony has been neither slight nor unfrequent, and has awakened interest and secured assistance in the furtherance of the great reform. One of the most important as well as interesting of these facts has been in reference to the state of the blood of the liquor-drinker; and an instance of recent occurrence is given by Dr. T. J. W. Pray, who, in a letter to the Medical Journal, from Dover, N. H., states the following case of an inebriate of South Berwick, Me., aged 35 years, who had long been subject to fits of intoxication, and was daily accustomed to the demands of a ruling passion. 'For five days previous to the examination of the blood, he had been in a beastly state of inebriation; and indeed it was found, upon inquiry, that he had drank, in that time, two gallons of 'West India rum.' At the expiration of the fifth day he went to Dr. J. C. Hanson, complaining of the usual symptoms of drunkenness, and wishing medical aid. Dr. Hanson, seeing that he did not require any active medical treatment, but rather an expectant plan, determined to deplete him a very little for an experiment. The blood was forthwith drawn; and it was found destitute, in a measure, of its watery elements—alcohol having been substituted therefor. Immediately a lighted taper was applied to it, and it began to burn with a flame similar to that of alcohol. This produced such an effect upon the inebriate, that he refrained from his intemperate habits, and afterwards became a sober man.'

SUBTERRANEAN FIRE IN ENGLAND.

The village of Lower Haugh, near Rotherham, England, presents a curious and interesting aspect. An extensive bed of coal beneath the village is on fire, and has been in that condition, burning with greater or less intensity, for at least twenty years. The coal in certain places bassets out—that is, comes up to the surface of the ground; and it was at one of these bassets that the fire originally commenced, having been ignited by a clamp, (a fire for burning stones intended for road materials.) The subterranean fire has continued to advance in various directions up to the present time, its progress being manifested by the appearance, at intervals, of smoke and flame at the surface of the ground; the spread of which has generally been stopped, however, by puddling the eruptions with clay, &c. A feeling of apprehension as to the ultimate fate of the village, has always continued to prevail, and some years ago the destruction of the mausoleum of the Wentworth family was threatened by the approach of the fire, but, happily, the calamity was averted by severing the bed of coal, for which purpose a shaft was specially sunk. Latterly the work of destruction appears to have been going on with unwonted rapidity, and has created a corresponding degree of alarm. The ground in several large tracts, is one huge hotbed, and where the heat is not so intense as to destroy vegetation, the villagers turn it to very good account in raising crops of vegetables. Two crops of potatoes are secured in one season. The exposed earth is quite warm, even in the depth of winter. Were this state of things confined within prescribed limits, it would be very well, and the villagers would regard it as an unmixed blessing, but this is by no means the case. The unnatural heat engenders a disagreeable smoke, which is continually ascending and adulterating the atmosphere, doubtless to the detriment of animal health; and the houses in the worst localities are often filled with warm air, strongly charged with sulphur, rendering them, as habitations, little better than a coal pit. The cellars naturally are the worst. Of course, it is impracticable to keep food in them; not unfrequently they cannot be entered with safety. How long this extraordinary state of things is to continue, no one can tell.

An ingenious Yankee has invented a machine which is destined to come into universal use. It consists of the attachment of a cheap, simple, and durable alarm to a lock of almost any description, so arranged as not to interfere in any respect with the action of the lock, and so connected with the bolt, that the latter cannot be withdrawn, or even the attempt made, without giving an alarm, at once distinct and loud enough to awaken any person in the vicinity, and which may be distinctly heard at the distance of twenty or twenty-five rods.

Anecdote of Chancellor Kent.—The late Chancellor Kent was one of those men whose innate dignity enabled him to take in good part familiarities—the result of ignorance and accident. He was exceedingly fond of martial music; and hearing the drums of a recruiting party, who had taken a stand at the corner of the street, beating a point of war, he walked out to listen to it nearer. Insensibly he was whistling the burthen of the tune, when the man of war accosted him—

'You are fond of such music, then, my fine fellow!'

'Very,' was the reply.

'Well, then,' said Sergeant Kite, 'why not join us? Good quarters—good pay—large bounty; besides, our Captain is a glorious fellow. Why won't you, now? You can't do better.'

'Well,' said the Chancellor, 'I have one pretty strong objection.'

'What is it?' asked the Sergeant.

'Why, just now I happen to have a better trade.'

'What trade is it?' asked the inquisitor.

'I am Chancellor of the State of New York.'

'Whew!' interjected the Sergeant. 'Strike up!—quick time!—forward march!' Off tramped the military man, without looking behind him; leaving the Chancellor to enjoy his laugh at the adventure. [Home Journal.

Improvements in Paper Making.—The readiness and facility with which the manufacture of paper is now carried on is really astonishing. The Journal of Commerce remarks: "We were informed a few days since, by a large paper dealer in this city, that it was not uncommon for him to have in his warehouse, and sell, at 9 o'clock in the morning, paper which was in rags a hundred and fifty miles from New York at 9 o'clock of the previous morning." A better illustration of the power of steam could not be given, or of the progress of the age. The rags are placed in the duster, thence conveyed to the troughs or vats, where (in some kinds of paper) the sizing is mixed with the pulp, and from these vats the paper passes over heated rollers, and finally between two immensely heavy iron rollers, which give it the glazed surface, and it is then cut, folded, packed, and sent to the railroad, all in the course of a few hours. The Telegraph enables New York merchants to order paper in Massachusetts at any moment, and receive the returns, manufactured, and even ruled, by almost the next steamer.

What a Gentleman may do, and what he may not do.—He may carry a brace of partridges, but not a leg of mutton. He may be seen in the omnibus box at the opera, but not on the box of an omnibus. He may be seen, in a stall inside the theatre, but not at a stall outside one. He may dust another person's jacket, but must not brush his own. He may kill a man in a duel, but he must n't eat peas with a knife. He may thrash a coal-heaver, but he must n't ask twice for soup. He may pay his debts of honor, but he need not trouble himself about his tradesmen's bills. He may drive a stage coach, but he must n't take or carry coppers. He may ride a horse as a jockey, but he must n't exert himself in the least to get his living. He must never forget what he owes to himself as a gentleman, but he need not mind what he owes as a gentleman to his tailor. He may do anything, or be anybody, in fact, within the range of a gentleman—go through the insolvent debtor's court, or turn billiard marker, but he must never, on any account, carry a brown paper parcel, or appear in the street without a good pair of gloves.

Anecdote of Nash.—A young lady who was just come out of the country, and affected to dress in a very plain manner, was sitting on a bench at Bath, as Beau Nash, the director of the ceremonies at that place, and some of his companions, were passing by; upon which, turning to one of them, he said, "There is a smart country girl; I will have some discourse with her." Then going up to the lady, "So, child," says he, "you are just come to Bath, I see." "Yes, sir," answered the lady. "And you have been a good girl in the country, and learned to read your book, I hope?" "Yes, sir." "Pray, now," says he, let me examine you? I know you have read your Bible and the history of Tobit and his dog; now can you tell me what was the dog's name?" "Yes, sir," says she: "his name was Nash, and an impudent dog he was."

Paying for Seeing a Great Man.—Celebrated men are often much annoyed by the visits of strangers. A student once called at Goethe's house, and requested to see him. Goethe, contrary to his usual custom, consented to be seen, and after the student had waited a short time in the ante-chamber, he appeared, and, without speaking, took a chair and seated himself in the middle of the room. The student, far from being embarrassed by this unexpected proceeding, took a lighted wax candle in his hand, and walked round the poet, deliberately viewed him on all sides, then, setting down the candle, he drew out his purse, and taking from it a small piece of silver, put it on the table and went away without speaking a word.

London.—According to the Rev. Mr. Bellows, the sale of the public parks of London would probably pay off the national debt. "The first and last characteristic of London," he writes, "the peculiarity which thrusts itself upon you every moment, is its size! Of this no description gives you any adequate idea. To say that it is thirty miles round, or that one may ride seven or eight miles across the town without getting out of the uninterrupted rows of houses; to say that it is ten times as large as New York, and has a hundred streets half as long and as well built as Broadway; to say that it includes parks, in which the whole city of Boston, or all New York, below Bleecker-st., might be enclosed, may help one to form a notion of its magnitude."

Mothers.—It is true that the sacrifices you make for the world will be little known by it—men govern and earn the glory; and the thousand watchful nights and sacrifices, by which a mother purchases a hero, or a poet, for the state, are forgotten, not once counted; for the mothers themselves do not count them; and so, one century after another, do mothers unnamed and unthanked, send forth the arrows, the suns, the storm-birds, and the nightingales of time! But seldom does a Cornelia find a Plutarch, who connects her name with the Gracchi. But as those two sons who bore their mother to the temple of Delphi were rewarded by death, so your guidance of your children will only find its perfect recompense at the termination of life. New Mode of Stealing a Ride.—A remarkable journey was performed by a cat on the Auburn and Rochester Railroad a few days since. As the freight train east stopped at the several way stations, the mewing of a cat was heard, and on reaching Fisher's an investigation was gone into, resulting in the discovery, that a cat was within one of the plate-wheels, which were hollow, and having three openings about the size of a man's fist. Poor Puss had made her way into one of these holes before the starting of the train, and being unable to make her escape had been carried fifteen miles, making in that distance 14,666 revolutions. On being relieved from her uncomfortable position, she manifested no particular uneasiness, but took it very coolly. [Rochester Paper.

The Pine Distemper.—The Mobile Herald says that the disease which is destroying the pine forests of the Carolinas, has made its appearance in Baldwin Co., Ala. It exhibits some singular phenomena. Occasionally it proceeds in a straight line, destroying not only the full grown trees, but the small shoots just springing up. Then again it goes into circles, leaving trees in the intermediate spaces sound and vigorous. The trees die just as though they had been girdled; the leaves wither and fall off, and the trunk soon runs to decay. Our informant does not attribute the cause of this strange distemper to worms. The only one seen about it is the common one peculiar to the pine tree. His impression is, that the cause is entirely an atmospheric one.

Tobacco and Teeth.—It has long been a popular whim, that tobacco was a preservative of the teeth, tending to prevent tartarous excresences, which inflame the gums and render the blood-vessels irritable and tender. Dr. Burdell, an experienced dentist of this city, in a late work on the effects of tobacco, alcohol, and drugs on the teeth, gives the following testimony: I have found much more difficulty in fitting artificial teeth in the mouths of tobacco chewers than others, owing to the irritable and tender state of the gums. Tobacco causes the gums to recede from the teeth, whereby they become loosened.

VARIETY.

A correspondent of the London Literary Gazette, alluding to the numerous cases of death from accidental poisonings, and particularly the melancholy fate of the late royal academician, Mr. Owen, adds, "I may venture to affirm, there is scarce even a cottage in this country that does not contain an invaluable, certain, and immediate remedy for such events, nothing more than a desert-spoonful of made mustard, mixed in a tumbler glass of warm water, and drank immediately; it acts as an instantaneous emetic, is always ready, and may be used with safety in any case where one is required. By making this simple antidote known, you may be the means of saving many a fellow creature from an untimely end."

The Duke of Albuquerque, Spain, died so wealthy, that the weighing of his gold and silver occupied two hours each day for six weeks. Among other things, there were one thousand four hundred dozen plates, five hundred great dishes, seven hundred small ones, and everything else in proportion. There were also seventy-six silver ladders, to set things on the cupboard, which were ascended by little steps, like the altars in a great hall.

It is stated that an Italian artist, Sig. Calyo, is engaged in sketching the scenery on the banks of the Connecticut, with a view to the execution of a complete Panorama of the Connecticut Valley. This stream is inferior to the Rhine and the Hudson in the grandeur of its scenery, but for picturesque variety, and the delightful freshness of its landscapes, it is surpassed by none in the world.

A wag having had a dispute with a man who kept a sausage shop, and owing him a grudge, ran into his shop one day as he was serving several good customers, with an immense dead cat, which he quickly deposited on the counter, saying, 'This makes nineteen; as you are busy now we'll settle some other time;' and he was off in a twinkling. The customers, aghast, soon followed him, leaving their sausages behind.

The wool trade of Michigan has increased with unexampled rapidity. In 1841 the quantity exported did not exceed 20,000 pounds. Last year the quantity exported was estimated at 1,000,000 pounds, and the surplus this year is estimated at 1,500,000 pounds. During this time the home consumption has been greatly increased.

The New York Journal of Commerce says, that the sound of a cannon can be heard frequently at the distance of forty and even sixty miles, while the sound of thunder can seldom be heard more than six or seven, and never over ten. And yet thunder, when near by, is louder than the loudest cannon, and the key would appear not very different.

Lieut. Gov. Reed, of Massachusetts, recently stated before the Legislative Temperance Society, that in 1827, 1,902,915 gallons of distilled spirits were imported and manufactured in Boston—while in 1847, the quantity was reduced to 550,000, being a difference of 1,442,915 gallons.

Mr. J. A. Ballantyne's library was sold in Edinburgh the other day. The Western Boatman says that from 1835 to 1840, there were built 552 steamboats for the navigation of the Western rivers, mostly on the Ohio. The average age of the boats is five years. Of the 552 boats, the manner of loss was thus: 266 worn out, 215 snagged, 42 burnt, 22 lost by collision, 7 lost by explosion.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

BOARD OF INSTRTCTION.

W. C. KENYON, A. M., } Principals.
IRA SAYLES, A. M., }

As isted by nine able and experienced Teachers, five in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past ten years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to also continue to merit a share of public patronage

Extensive buildings are now erected for the accommodation of students, and for Recitation and Lecture Rooms, &c. They occupy an eligible position, and are finished in the best style of modern architecture; and the different apartments are heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical

Ladies and Gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board and rooms can also be had in private families, if particularly desired.

Each room for those who board in the Hall is furnished with a bed and bedding, a table, two chairs, and a pail.

The plan of instruction adopted in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the student, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The Health, the Manners, and the Morals of our Students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

REGULATIONS.

1. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.
2. Punctuality in attending all regular Academic exercises will be required.
3. The use of Tobacco, for chewing or smoking, will not be allowed either in or about the Academic buildings.
4. Playing at games of chance cannot be allowed.
5. Using profane language cannot be allowed.
6. The use of any kind of intoxicating drinks cannot be allowed, unless prescribed in case of sickness, by a regular physician.
7. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, cannot be permitted.
8. Gentlemen and ladies of the Institution will not be permitted to visit the rooms of the opposite sex, except in cases of imperious necessity, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.
9. Good order must be maintained at all times, and in all the rooms and halls of the Institution, and in all the intercourse of students with each other.
10. All students are required to retire regularly at the ringing of the bell designated for that purpose, as occasion may require; and to rise at the ringing of the morning bell, also designated.
11. Any room, occupied by students, will, at all times, be subject to the visitation of the Teachers of the Institution, who are required to see that the regulations are complied with.
12. Students will be required to keep their own rooms in good order, and to pay all unnecessary damages, either of rooms or of furniture furnished with the rooms.

REGULAR ACADEMIC EXERCISES.

The regular exercises, at which all the students will be required to attend, unless specially excused, are, Chapel exercises each morning during the term; Recitations, from two to four, five days each week, from Monday morning till Friday evening. Compositions and Declamations, one-half day, once in two weeks, Literary, Scientific, and Moral Lectures by the Principals. Public Worship, once in each week, either on Saturday or Sunday, according as the students may be in the habit of keeping the Sabbath, either on the seventh or first day of the week.

GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the students will be in the hands of the Principals, and will be strictly and steadily exercised, and at the same time, strictly parental. The object of our academic government being to secure the greatest possible amount of physical, intellectual, and moral good to the students themselves, regularity and order of exercises, and good and wholesome citizens to society. No unwarrantable means will be made use of to enforce the observance of the above regulations; yet our constant endeavor will be, to make the means resorted to as effective as human means may be.

Parents who place their children in this Institution, and all students who are sufficiently old to understand the necessity of order, cannot be too well assured that the foregoing regulations form the most essential part of the contract between them and us; and that whatever student wantonly violates them, and shows himself incorrigibly determined on pursuing his waywardness, will be expelled from the privileges of the Institution, and will not be permitted to re-enter it again, without special proof of reformation. Nor will an expelled student have any deduction made from full term charges.

Farther, parents are requested not to place money for expenses, in the hands of students who are not old enough to use money with discretion and economy. Either of the Principals, or the Book-keeper of the Institution, will act as fiscal guardian of such students without charge.

ADMISSION.

Candidates for admission as students, must present testimonials of good moral character, or be known to possess such a character, and must be willing to comply unreservedly with the foregoing regulations; and no one will be permitted to receive instructions in any class, until all academic bills, for the term in prospect, be paid or satisfactorily arranged.

ACADEMIC TERMS.

The Academic Year for 1848–9 consists of three terms, as follows:

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1848, and ending Thursday, November 23, 1848.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, December 5, 1848, and ending Thursday, March 15, 1849.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, April 3, 1849, and ending July 12, 1849.

As the plan of instruction in this Institution, laid out for each class, will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue through the term, and accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the terms.

N. B. Students who are expecting to teach during the winter or summer, will specify such intention on entering in the beginning of the fall or spring term; and, for the special accommodation of such, a day will be set apart at first, on which they can leave, if they wish; and they will not be permitted to leave on any other day, nor will any other than teachers be permitted to leave on the day specified.

Farther, it is of the utmost importance that the student be present at the day of the opening of the term, as on that and the succeeding day, the students entering are examined and classified.

It is also suggested to parents who patronize this Institution from the distance of a few miles around, that students should go home only once during the term, as every absence from classes is always attended with disadvantages to the student. This is a suggestion, and not imperative. But to meet this suggestion, the exercise of the school will close at noon on the seventh Friday in each term, and open again on the afternoon of Monday following.

EXPENSES.

THE JUDGES JUDGED—NO. 1.

The decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania respecting the rights of Sabbatarians, is now before the public. The decision, and the Opinion of the presiding Judge, call for the gravest reflections. So far as the Judiciary of Pennsylvania is concerned, this decision is final, and places the rights of Sabbatarians to the use of the first day of the week beyond recovery. Their time and their consciences are not their own; they are given over by the Legislature and the Judiciary to the dominant sects of the land. What matters it, whether the consciences thus shamelessly violated, are few or many—whether the interests thus wantonly sacrificed to bigotry, are great or small? The conscience of one man is as sacred as the consciences of many men. The constitutional rights of one man ought to be as faithfully protected as the rights of many. To violate these, by the forms of law in one instance, is in effect taking away the safeguards of the whole. As far as the Jew and the Christian Sabbatarian are concerned, the courts of Pennsylvania have placed their religious rights just where the Star-Chamber of the Tudors and Stuarts of the English throne placed them three centuries ago. The Court itself has decided upon the meaning of the divine law, has determined what is and what is not a proper subject for the cognizance of conscience, and claims that it has "rightly repudiated such a notion" as was alledged by the plaintiff as seriously affecting his conscientious faith. Yea, so dogmatical is the Court, that in its decision on the subject it says, "Indeed the meaning of the command is so obvious as scarcely to leave room for construction." That is, there is no room for the Sabbatarian construction, for the Court gives its own construction, and authorizes compulsion to force the Sabbatarian to submission! Like that odious court of our father land, that persecuted the saints of God centuries ago, and whose infamy is everlasting, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has trampled the sober convictions of Christian men in the dust as trifling scruples, because the Court and courtly theologians, have no conscientious questions upon the subject themselves. To us this decision appears signally arbitrary and unjust; and were there no other appeal, we should look upon it as a retrograde step towards the bigotry and persecution which degraded nominally Christian governments centuries ago. As far as the Sabbatarian question is concerned, the object of the Court is obviously to place it there. The whole document looks back for its reasons toward the gloom of Puritanical divinity, and gathering confidence from the asperity of Puritanical legislation, ventures to rest its decision upon the exploded sophistry of by-gone days, when the peace and welfare of society were made dependent upon the undisturbed prevalence of the religious observances of the dominant sect. The document is altogether wanting in the manly character of a decision formed upon honest, independent convictions of natural and constitutional right. It appears to us like a time-serving decision, and a time-serving "opinion read by" the Judge to get rid of a dilemma at the least present cost. Thanks to the overruling providence of Jehovah, although this decision is final in the Judiciary of Pennsylvania, there are other tribunals yet open, where the judgment of the judges may be arraigned. To these we ought, yes, and must appeal. The first is public opinion. All the State Constitutions of our country recognize and reäffirm one grand provision of our National Bill of Rights, viz., "the freedom of speech and of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." Here there is no final appeal; this tribunal is always open; and opinions that have long stood firm are here often kicked into pie. The man who at this day attempts to shut it up against any intelligent class of his fellow-citizens, will soon find himself like Samson in the temple of Dagon; he may injure his enemies, but he will assuredly kill himself. Never were we more seriously called upon by circumstances, as a people, to avail ourselves of this right, than at present. This subject we are bound thoroughly to discuss, and place it in all its bearings before the whole people. If the courts of Pennsylvania and South Carolina are infatuated enough to go back in their decisions to the gloomy asperities of the Puritans, we do not believe it is so with the majority of our fellow-citizens. True, public opinion is thought to be greatly against us. Be it so; yet it is on a subject they never have understood. It has never been fairly discussed before the public at large. They never have had more than one side of the question; and that has always been a garbled account. Few public papers dare give it a fair hearing. Is there one besides our own that dare do so? There is one sect, of acknowledged repute, in the land, who from the beginning of our government have had weight and address enough to control public sentiment in this question; and they have diligently used them for that purpose, so that their peculiar view of the subject has been incorporated into the morals of the people, and the civil codes of the old States of the Union. In all the Western States there is a moderating of these stern asperities of the Puritan laws. And if there were no other hope for a revulsion of public opinion, the reflex influence of the juster sentiments of the West must soon effect the question in the East. This is but a dernier hope; we have hopes far brighter and nearer than this. We live in a day of change—a day of discussion; and what is public opinion today may be, and often is, reversed to-morrow. The servants of the Lord will often have occasion to say, "What hath God wrought." Let Sabbatarians be united and vigilant in defending themselves in the observance of the law of the Lord, and they will yet obtain their rights. It is with this view of the subject, that we propose to examine the doings of the courts of Pennsylvania; and not with any evil design toward the judges. We hold them to the tribunal of public opinion for the injury done to natural and constitutional rights, with a strong assurance that that injury will be repaired in our own day. S. D.

THE LIBERTY PARTY AT OBERLIN, OHIO.

The following Resolutions and Abstract of an Address were adopted by a meeting of Liberty party men at Oberlin, Ohio, July 6th. They come to us in an "Extra" of the Oberlin Evangelist, with a request for publication. No doubt many of our readers will be interested in perusing them.

Resolutions.

Resolved, 1st, That we hold the following to be the practical principles and measures of the Liberty Party.

(1.) The abolition of Slavery in the District of Columbia—in the Territories under the jurisdiction of Congress, and in all places in which the United States hold exclusive authority.

(2.) The abolition of the Slave trade in the District of Columbia, the coast-wise slave trade, and in all the Territories under the jurisdiction of Congress.

(3.) The emancipation of the Federal Government from the control of the Slave power, its entire divorce from the support of Slavery, and the array of all its constitutional powers for the extinction of slavery throughout the Union.

(4.) The exclusion of Slavery from all new Territory now acquired or hereafter to be acquired by the United States.

(5.) The repeal of all laws in the nominally Free States which make any distinction among their people on account of their color.

(6.) The support of such candidates for office, and such alone, as are the known and tried advocates of these measures, and will make their success the paramount object of their political action.

Resolved, 2d, That we love the Liberty Party only as an instrument for the enforcement of these principles and the success of these measures; and whenever any new party shall make the same principles its basis, and the same measures the specific and paramount object of its aims—and shall bring out as its candidates men of tried integrity and ability, who shall avow the same principles, and adopt the same measures—we shall rejoice to see the Liberty Party merged in this new party, whenever the hope of success is rationally increased thereby.

Resolved, 3d, That until such a union be effect, we continue Liberty Party men, standing on the same basis as heretofore, and voting for candidates who are the proper representatives and embodiment of our principles and measures.

Resolved, 4th, That we recommend to all Liberty men who may attend the Free Territory Convention, to be held at Buffalo on the 9th of August, 1848, respectfully, but most earnestly, to press said Convention to adopt these principles and measures, explicitly—and to put in nomination candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency who shall ably and adequately represent them.

Resolved, 5th, That we farther recommend that, succeeding in these efforts, they pledge to the Convention and its nominees their support; but that should the Convention refuse or omit to grant the request, they and all Liberty men throughout the land maintain their own organization, and vote for their own candidates—and that, should the present candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency withdraw, a convention be called to put in nomination other candidates for those offices.

Abstract of the Address.

We cannot join any political organization that does not embrace all our principles and measures, and make their success the specific and paramount aim of its efforts; for the following reasons.

1. Every one of these measures involves a principle, which we have no right either to abandon or to cease to make a test.

2. Because dropping these measures now, we make the confession, (unconsciously perhaps,) either that we were insincere in making them tests before, or that we no longer deem them vital to our cause. We could not do either of these things honestly.

3. Because these principles are our strength, and the very compromise which induces us to omit them in the new issue, induces a state of mind fatal to their vigorous enforcement in any form.

4. Because such a compromise lets slip the best opportunity of raising the masses to the adoption of our principles, and submits the whole new movement to the control of influences unpledged to any fundamental principle of the Anti-Slavery cause.

5. Because, omitting these measures at the outset, we could neither urge their enforcement on our candidates, if elected, nor their adoption by the party, without being charged with bad faith, and introducing confusion and disaster into the ranks.

6. Because we never knew a body of men who, after boldly urging a group of measures as tests, gave up those measures, and yet maintained, as a body, moral power enough to press those measures afterwards with any effect.

7. Because such a step is one in the wrong direction;—an enterprise should insist on some higher application of its principles, rather than drop, one by one, its old and vital ones.

8. Because at the present crisis, with the proposals as now made, we are asked to disband our organization and join a movement which adopts but one of our measures, only to suffer certain defeat on that.

S. S. ASHLEY, Secretary.

THE VILLAGE CHURCH.

The village church is passing gay,
The bells gush out in merry tune,
A flag is o'er the turret gray,
The porch holds all the flowers of June;
For youth and beauty come to wed,
With bounding form and beaming eye—
With all the raptures love can shed,
And all the hope that gold can buy;
And children twine, with noisy glee,
White favors round the cypress tree.

An old man sitteth on a grave—
His steps no more are firm and fast,
And slenderly his white locks wave
As breeze and butterfly go past;
A gentle smile lights up his face,
And then he turns to gaze around,
For he has come to choose the place
Where he shall sleep in hallow'd ground;
"Just by your daisy patch, (saith he,)
'T is there—'t is there I'd have it be."

The bridal hearts in triumph glow,
With all the world before them yet;
The old man's pulse beats calm and slow,
Like sun-rays lengthening as they set.
THEY see the fancied hours to come,
HE sees the real days gone by;
THEY deem the earth a fairy home,
HE thinks it well that man should die.
Oh, goodly sight! it should be so—
Youth glad to stay, Age fit to go.

THE SLAVE MART AT NEW ORLEANS.

BY GRAPHO MANIA.

> "So spake the fiend, and with necessity,
> The tyrant's plea, excused his devilish deeds."

The hundred slaves were huddled together near the auctioneer's platform, where one by one they were successively to pass under the hammer. The men sat in stoical silence. The women, especially such as were mothers, gazed in anxious grief upon their little ones, as they playfully grouped themselves upon the floor at their feet. The children that but a short time since had been pressed to the mother's bosom, with all the earnest yearnings that none but a mother's heart can feel, were to be sold and separated away to cruel servitude, never more to know the endearment of maternal love. All the ties of consanguinity and friendship were here to be severed for life, and the miserable objects to be sent from the place where all their happy associations had clustered, away to the fever and ague swamps of Mississippi, or to the barbarous cotton fields of upper Texas. And such an outrage upon humanity was to be perpetrated in open day-light, in a Christian city, and witnessed, yes, sanctioned by hundreds of witnesses. One could hardly realize the atrocious fact. Here, in the freest country on earth, and in the nineteenth century, was a scene transpiring that would have disgraced the times of Nero or Caligula. It is no dream of fiction, it is too real. And yet no avenging hand is put forth to stay the outrage. The work goes on.

The two next victims are a noble middle aged man and his wife, who called herself twenty-two. They were not to be sold together—for they would not bring so much money as if sold separate, and moreover it seems to be the design of every one who has anything to do with slaves, to discourage and deaden all the domestic loves to which human nature is addicted. The young wife was first questioned in this manner, that she might perchance recommend herself:—

"How old are you?"

"Twenty-two."

"How long have you been married?"

"Three years."

"How many children have you?"

"None."

And as she made the last reply in a saddened tone, the tears started from her eyes, and she turned beseechingly to her husband for protection. Upon this the questioner, too, turns ferociously towards him.

"You villain you—have you lived three years with this wench without having any children?"

Now the true man was seen, although bound in fetters, and trampled in the dust. With form erect and folded arms, and with a dignity that might have lent lustre to Othello himself, he calmly replies—

"We have had one, but God took him."

The fact that the woman had been the mother of but one child, and that dead, was the reason for the low price of two hundred dollars for which she was knocked down. She was purchased by a Red River planter, to be turned out into the fields to hoe and pick cotton. The husband was afterwards sold for seven hundred and fifty dollars, to be sent into the swamps of Tennessee as a wood chopper. The two were separated never more to meet in this world. It is expected that husbands and wives thus separated will form new connections, rear up new families, and perhaps be again sold and divided asunder. Thus are the holiest of the institutions of Heaven rendered void by the management of men; and thus are poor ignorant slaves made to commit the sins that are denounced by all moral and civil law, and by the direct commands of God.

The last spectacle was as much as we could hear. We thought of our own deep domestic loves—then three thousand miles away. The love and the sympathy of the wife so entwined into our own soul, that no fate in time or eternity could separate the two whose separate existences had become one life. The clinging fondness of the little ones, who will not be content with a separate existence, but insist upon being a part of the parent still. We left the scene, but the anguish of that separated pair followed us—it has not ceased to follow us since. There was the memory of their little log house in the skirt of cotton wood upon the river side; there was the place of their early love, as they had been reared up together on their wealthy owner's plantation; from thence had they entered the precincts of the church, and before God, and in the forms of the Episcopacy, had they promised to take each other "for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness, in health, to love, and to cherish, till death should part them, according to God's holy ordinance." There was born to them their little boy, who had gladdened their hearts—and then died; and there, hard by, was his little grave, over which they had wept together, and would only be comforted in believing that God had taken him. In that last long lingering look was crowded the gathering reminiscences of all the happiness they had known in life. [Chronotype.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE POWER OF KINDNESS.

Bundy and the Ferocious Prisoner.

The power of kindness is seen in the case of Haynes, executed in 1799 at Bristol, England. He was heavily ironed, yet so extremely turbulent and outrageous, that the other prisoners stood in fear of him, and were obliged to be constantly on their guard. It became necessary even to call out the military; but this only irritated him, and made him worse. He would expose his naked breast to the soldiers' bayonets, dare them to run him through, and say he would rather be shot dead than surrender himself to them. Yet, when force failed, remonstrance succeeded; for he actually delivered up to the persuasions of a gentleman, a weapon which a file of soldiers were unable to take from him. A pious minister by the name of Bundy, used to visit him, and at length told the keeper he wished to spend the night with the felon. He was warned of his danger; but, moved with compassion, he persisted, and entered the prisoner's cell. Finding him prostrate on the floor under the weight of his irons, he persuaded the keeper to let him have one hand and foot at liberty. The keeper retired late at night, locking after him three massive doors; and Haynes, immediately lifting up his liberated hand, and reaching a clasped knife he had concealed, rushed fiercely towards him, exclaiming with the voice and looks of a demon, "Now thou art in my power, I will kill thee." The man of God thought his end had come; but suddenly recalling the passage, "thou canst have no power over me unless it be given thee from above," was instantly raised above all fear, and calmly met the enraged culprit, to whom he kindly said, "Now, my friend, what harm have I done you, or of what service would my death be to you?" He then spoke of the love of Christ, and assured the felon, that he was ready to receive all, even the most wicked, who came to him. These words of kindness softened the culprit's heart; he threw down the knife, acknowledged his guilt, and burst into tears. Deeply convicted at length of sin, he asked if it was possible for such a sinner as himself ever to be saved? The anguish of his mind was extreme; he would often weep bitterly in view of his sins; and there is reason to hope that he died a sincere penitent.

Isaac Hopper and Cain.

When Isaac Hopper lived in Philadelphia, his attention was called to a colored waiter, called Cain, who was remarkable for profanity. Neither persuasion nor rebuke had any effect to change this bad habit. One day Hopper encountered him in the street, quarreling and pouring forth volleys of oaths that made one shudder. Having faith in fines and constables, Hopper took him before a magistrate, who fined him for blasphemy.

Twenty years after, Isaac met Cain, whom he had not seen for a very long time. His outward appearance was much changed for the worse; his garments were tattered, and his person emaciated. This touched the Friend's heart. He stepped up, shook hands, and spoke kindly to the forlorn being. "Dost not thou remember me," said the Quaker, "and how I had thee fined for swearing?" "Yes, indeed, I do; I remember what I paid as well as yesterday." "Well, did it do thee any good?" "No, never a bit; it made me mad to have my money taken from me."

Hopper invited Cain to reckon up the interest on the fine, and paid him principal and interest. "I meant it for thy good, Cain, and I am sorry I did thee any harm."

Cain's countenance changed; the tears rolled down his cheeks; he took the money with many thanks; became a quiet man, and was heard to swear no more.

Pillsbury and the Giant Prisoner.

Mr. Pillsbury, warden of the State Prison in Connecticut, once received into the prison a man of gigantic stature, whose crimes had for seventeen years made him the terror of the country. He told the criminal when he came, he hoped he would not repeat the attempts to escape which he had made elsewhere. "It will be best," said he, "that you and I should treat each other as well as we can. I will make you as comfortable as I possibly can, and I shall be anxious to be your friend; and I hope you will not get me into difficulty on your account. There is a cell intended for solitary confinement; but we have never used it, and I should be sorry ever to have to turn the key upon any body in it. You may range the place as freely as I do; if you trust me, I shall trust you." The man was sulky, and for weeks showed only gradual symptoms of softening under the operation of Mr. Pillsbury's cheerful confidence. At length information was brought of the man's intention to break prison. The warden called him, and taxed him with it; the man preserved a gloomy silence. He was told that it was necessary for him to be locked in the solitary cell, and desired to follow the warden, who went first, carrying a lamp in one hand, and a key in the other. In the narrowest part of the passage, Mr. Pillsbury, a small, light man, turned round, and looked in the face of the stout criminal. "Now," said he, "I ask whether you have treated me as I deserve? I have done every thing I could to make you happy; I have trusted you; but you have never given me the least confidence in return, and have even planned to get me into difficulty. Is this kind? And yet I cannot bear to lock you up. If I had the least sign that you cared for me"—The man burst into tears. "Sir," said he, "I have been a very devil these seventeen years; but you treat me like a man." "Come, let us go back," said the warden. The convict had free range of the prison as before; and from that hour he began to open his heart to the warden, and cheerfully fulfilled his whole term of imprisonment.

Azel Backus and the Heathen.

At a festival at Ganesa's (Gumputtee's) temple in Ceylon, while the multitude of worshipers, assembled at the temple, were engaged in boiling their rice for an offering, one of them who went for water, fell into the well. As soon as the circumstance was made known to the crowd, they rushed to the well, and among them was the pandarum (priest) of the temple, who, as soon as he had gratified his curiosity, returned to the temple. None among them manifested the least concern for the unfortunate man who was sunk in the water. They looked into the well, and talked about the man in such imminent danger, with the most perfect indifference. Not an individual seemed to think assistance could or ought to be rendered, till one of the headmen came to the spot; he exerted all his influence to induce some one to dive into the water, which any person accustomed to swimming might have done with perfect safety, but his efforts were in vain. He then sent for the priest, who was known to be an expert swimmer. At the command of the headman he came, but excused himself from the act of mercy required of him, by saying that he could not absent himself so long from the duties of the temple without sustaining a loss. Just at this moment came to the place a young man, unknown to the crowd, who, as soon as he learned that a fellow being was drowning, threw aside his garment, and leaped into the well. After repeatedly diving, he found the body, and raised it to the surface of the water, from which it was taken by the by-standers. As the noise and confusion occasioned by taking out the lifeless body had subsided, a loud whisper passed along the crowd, "Who is that young man? Who is that good man?" They were not a little surprised, and some of the enemies of Christianity confounded, when they were told that this good Samaritan was Azel Backus, a Christian! This event did not a little towards stopping the mouths, and weakening the strength of some who were arrayed against Christians and the cause in which they are engaged; and is to all, who have any knowledge of Scripture, a striking comment on the words of inspiration, "Overcome evil with good."

GOD'S BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE.

Among the books that will be opened when God will reckon with the universe, one will be produced, filled with costlier records than the common transactions of time. In that precious volume—that "book of remembrance written before him for those that feared the Lord and thought upon his name"—how many little acts of the humblest saint, which the world never knew or noticed, will appear in golden capitals! How many forgotten words and looks of kindness, which dropped a healing anodyne into some broken heart, will there be shown the child of God, who fain will ask, "When did I THIS?" How brightly in those leaves of pearl will glow the pellucid jewel, which fell from the eye of him who gave all he had to give—a tear for another's wo! And the poor widow's mite—what a bright record shall be made of that, and of the midnight prayers she made for those pierced with sterner wants than her's! What a page in that heavenly album will be given to him who gave a cup of cold water to the disciple of the Lamb, with a heart big enough to have given the world! There will be shown the tableaux vivants of prison scenes, and sick and dying-bed scenes, whose eyes, with a heaven full of love in them, and hearts big with the immortal sympathy of God, ministered to the sick stranger, and him that was ready to perish. In that souvenir of eternity, will be preserved charities of celestial water that never found a record or remembrance on earth. [Burritt.

A JEW'S ARGUMENT.

"Some Roman senators examined the Jews in this manner: 'If God had no delight in the worship of idols, why did he not destroy them?' The Jews made answer, 'If men had worshiped only things of which the world had had no need, he would have destroyed the objects of their worship; but they also worship the sun, and moon, stars, and planets; and then he must have destroyed his worlds for the sake of these deluded men.' 'But still,' said the Romans, 'why does not God destroy the things which the world does not want, and leave those things which the world cannot be without?' 'Because,' replied the Jews, 'this would strengthen the hands of such as worship these necessary things, who would say, Ye allow now that these are gods, since they are not destroyed.'"

SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES.

The great question now before the people of this country, is whether the system of slavery shall be extended and strengthened by incorporating it into our free Territories. Congress has had the subject under discussion for a long time, and has barely succeeded in laying it on the table for the present, without any definite and permanent decision. Politicians and reformers have taken it up, and are debating it with a degree of earnestness which is seldom witnessed among them. It will undoubtedly be the principal topic before the great Convention which assembles this week at Buffalo. Indeed, all classes are beginning to feel, that the time has come to decide whether slavery shall be upheld and perpetuated, or whether steps shall be taken to limit its bounds and prevent its growth.

It is pretty generally acknowledged, we believe, in many parts of the South, as well as at the North, that slavery in the abstract is a flagrant wrong and a crying evil—a wrong to the slave, which no sophistry can justify, and an evil to the master and the country, which can only be palliated by the peculiar circumstances under which it exists, and the great difficulty of getting rid of it. In view of this general impression, one would suppose that scarcely any body could be found to favor its extension over territory in which it does not now exist. And such would undoubtedly be the case, if men were to act according to the dictates of their unsophisticated consciences. But as things are, they allow themselves to be swerved by what they regard as "constitutional compacts and compromises," until they bring this great question down to mere political grounds, and decide it in view of the same considerations which would influence them in the decision of a question relating to banks and tariffs.

There is one grand defect in the argument of all those who advocate the extension of slavery over new territory, which readers of their speeches cannot have overlooked. They claim that a slave is the property of his master in the same sense that a horse is the property of his owner; and that the master of a slave has as much right to take his slave into territory owned by the United States and there hold him as property, as the owner of a horse has to take his horse there and hold him as property. But this assumption overlooks the fact that the slave differs from the horse in being made property by law, and by that alone—a fact which Southern men are not slow to urge when their right to hold a man as property is assailed. Although the soil of new territory may be owned by the North and the South jointly, that is no reason why a black man whom the laws of South Carolina have made to be property, should be considered as property in this new territory. If the position assumed by southern men could be maintained, the conclusion would follow, that there is no such thing as free territory; all our new territory is as much slave territory as free, because it is owned by a Union composed of free and slave States. In that case, all the attempts to get Congress to establish slavery in new territory, would be gratuitous, since it already exists according to the assumption of those who advocate the measure.

The agitation of this question in connection with the presidential election, may raise an issue not often brought before the people on such occasions. Generally these elections are made to turn upon mere political considerations. In view of that fact, many Christian people have declined to take any active part in them, or even to exercise their right of suffrage—regarding the whole affair as a political one, in which no great moral questions were involved. It is possible, however, that the case may be different in the coming campaign. The question of freedom or slavery in all new States and Territories, may become the question for decision. In that case, we see not how the Christian can justify a neglect to cast his influence in favor of what he regards as being the righteous cause. Too long have good men left the election of rulers to wicked men. The consequences are daily seen in our national assemblies. Let those who are entrusted with the power of elevating men to the highest offices, weigh well their responsibilities.

Drayton Convicted.—The heroic but unfortunate Drayton, in whose vessel some seventy slaves recently attempted to escape from their house of bondage, has been tried and convicted on one indictment of stealing the negroes. The trial was in progress throughout last week. He was ably defended by Messrs. Mann and Carlisle. But the Judge, who is said to be decidedly pro-slavery in his feelings, charged the Jury strongly against him; and the jury, after twenty-four hours' deliberation, brought in a verdict as above stated. It is commonly reported, that nine of the jury were fellows who hang about the court-house of the District for the very purpose of being summoned as jurors, and getting the per diem allowance, and that they were all for a verdict of guilty at once; while the other three were Irishmen, and were for acquittal, from which judgment they were turned by the majority after twenty-four hours of fasting. There are numerous points of law reserved, and it is quite possible that this verdict may be set aside. Meanwhile the District Attorney is going on with his forty-one other indictments.

CHURCH AND STATE IN FRANCE.

It has been represented, that nearly all of the ecclesiastical bodies in France are in favor of a separation of the Church from the State. There is, however, as now appears, a good deal of difference of opinion among them upon the subject. The Jews, we believe, uniformly and unhesitatingly demand the separation of civil and ecclesiastical interests. The same may be said of some of the minor and more evangelical Protestant sects. But the Protestants in general seem to be quite undecided; they will not oppose the measure, neither will they do anything to hasten it. One of their journals says: "We will not demand our letter of divorce; but if the State gives it, we will accept it, and presenting it to God, we will say, In thee, O Lord, is our hope; let not our hope be confounded!" Among the Catholics there are some who advocate a separation; but they do so mainly on the ground that to receive from the Government what is bestowed equally upon all the religious communions, good and bad, is not consistent with their exclusive claims. It is very likely, in view of the prevailing feeling, that a separation will take place. It would doubtless have taken place long ago, except that the Government was desirous of retaining that hold upon religious organizations which it had through the money it paid them.

THE WISCONSIN ASSOCIATION.

The Wisconsin Seventh-day Baptist Association held its second anniversary with the Church in Albion, Dane Co., commencing July 6, 1848, at 10 o'clock, A. M. The Introductory Discourse was preached by Eld. Z. Campbell, from 1 Thess. 3: 12, 13—after which Eld. S. Coon was chosen Moderator, and J. H. Potter and T. L. Coon, Secretaries.

After preparing a list of delegates, and hearing reports from the Treasurer and Corresponding Secretary, the Letters from the Churches were read. The following are their statistics:

Milton.—Z. Campbell, pastor; S. Coon and D. Babcock, elders; W. P. Stillman, deacon; J. M. Todd, clerk; post-office, Milton. Added 19; deceased 3; rejected 1; dismissed by letter 2; total 108.

Albion.—O. P. Hull, pastor; J. Weed and A. Ayers, deacons; J. H. Potter, clerk; post-office, Albion. Added 4; deceased 2; total 81.

Walworth.—S. Coon, pastor; A. Maxson, deacon. Added 6; total 21.

The various Standing Committees were then appointed. These Committees presented their reports in due time, which were adopted by the Association, and the most important of which are given below.

Report of Committee on Benevolent Operations.

The Committee on Benevolent Operations would respectfully report, That in their opinion Christianity is one grand system of benevolence; and all societies and organizations, to effect any thing in the way of promoting the Gospel, should be deeply imbued with this divine principle. Destitute of this in some practical form, so as not only to have in view but actually to reach some particular object, we are not able to see what good can grow out of our organization as an Association. We are convinced that to enjoy life and health as Christians and as Christian Churches, we must identify ourselves with Christ and his kingdom by heartily embracing this cardinal doctrine. In view of these considerations, and the entire want of any efficient plan of operations now existing, affording a channel through which the benevolence of our brethren and sisters can reach any desired object, your Committee feel that an important branch of business has been committed to them. There are, in our opinion, the most urgent reasons why this Association should adopt speedy and efficient measures to extend the Gospel around us, and generally throughout the world. There are three fields of labor to which your Committee would earnestly invite attention. First, the giving of the Gospel to all our fallen race. Second, the circulation of Sabbath Tracts. Third, home missionary operations, or missionary labor within our own borders. We therefore submit the following plan of operations. First, that this Association shall be a Missionary Association, and that it shall appoint the following officers, viz. a President, a Vice President, Corresponding and Recording Secretaries, a Treasurer, and three Directors, who shall constitute an Executive Board to transact business, and shall be elected annually; five members of the Board to constitute a quorum. We suggest, in the second place, that this Association shall be a Tract Society; that its object shall be to circulate publications, and that it shall appoint the officers necessary to do its business. In the next place, we would suggest that this Association be a Home Missionary Association; that its object shall be to promote the truth in our own country and vicinity; that it appoint the officers necessary for the purposes of the society, and that these societies be distinct from each other; that when money is contributed the object should be distinctly specified. We farther suggest, that the Quarterly Meetings be recognized as meetings of this Association, and shall be competent to dispose of the reports of the Executive Committees of these societies, who shall report quarterly to that body.

The following are the officers of the Missionary Society: Eld. S. Coon, President; Eld. D. Babcock, Vice President; W. H. Redfield, Cor. Sec.; John W. Stillman, Rec. Sec.; D. J. Green, Treasurer; O. P. Hull, J. M. Todd, and J. Bond, Directors.

Resolutions.

Whereas, there are violent and oppressive movements among first-day people in Wisconsin against the Seventh-day Baptists, averse to Christianity, equal rights, and the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and tending to unite Church and State; therefore—Resolved, That this Association, collectively and individually, awake to their interest and a sense of duty, in maintaining equal rights and privileges with other denominations at the hands of our legislators.

Resolved, That we, the members of this Association, disapprove of all Secret Societies of whatsoever name.

Whereas, a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures is of the very first importance to the existence of vital piety and practical godliness, therefore—Resolved, That we earnestly recommend to the members of the churches composing this Association, who are heads of families, the necessity and importance of reading the Bible to their families, and of maintaining daily family prayer.

Resolved, That we, the members of this Association, deeply deplore the existence of the system of Slavery, and the evils which it entails upon every inhabitant of the United States.

State of Religion.

The Committee on the State of Religion report, that viewing the state of religion generally, although we have cause of gratitude to the great Author of every good and perfect gift, we have much cause for self-abasement and humiliation of soul, and are loudly called upon to repent and do our first works; and to effect an object so desirable, that we now, like the prodigal, may return to our Father's house from which we have most unwisely departed. The field of usefulness that in the providence of God we are invited to occupy, urges upon our consideration, as ministers and laymen, the necessity to awake out of sleep, and come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty, in the use of all the means of grace, and the cultivation of vital piety in our hearts, and not to be satisfied until it can be said of us, that we are the light of the world and the salt of the earth.

Corresponding Letter.

The Wisconsin Seventh-day Baptist Association, to the several sister Associations of the same faith, greeting:—

Beloved Brethren,—We rejoice in every testimony we receive of your attachment and love to the cause of our glorious Redeemer, and your cordial coöperation with us in promoting its advancement. Though no delegation has appeared, and no letters have been received from sister Associations, yet we believe their prayers arise to the great Head of the Church for the prosperity of Zion in the far West. When we consider the extensive field by which we are surrounded, we are led to rest on the promises of our heavenly Father, and go forward in the performance of duty, trusting that our feeble efforts, through his assistance, will induce men to embrace the truth as it is in Jesus. We shall be happy to continue our correspondence with you and welcome your messengers and minutes at our next and all subsequent convocations.

The following are the officers of the Association for the ensuing year, viz. John Stillman, Treasurer; W. H. Redfield, Cor. Sec.; Orlinzer Allen, Rec. Sec. After a session which continued through the fifth, sixth, and first days of the week, the Association adjourned to meet with the Church in Walworth, on the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in July, 1849, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

VISIT TO AN ANCESTOR'S GRAVE.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Dear Sir,—It has been a source of pleasure to the good of all ages, to cherish and perpetuate the memory of their virtuous and honored ancestry; and the "first commandment with promise" seems directly calculated to aid or encourage this laudable impulse. No people under heaven have more faithfully discharged this duty than the Israelites, who, under its direction, have left on record a most exact and faithful account of their family descent. The pleasure imparted by such researches, has often inclined me to linger among the tombs for relics of former times, with which I could associate some history or tradition. Impressed with such feelings, I recently seated myself near the tomb of an ancestor, (in an isolated spot on the bank of the Pawcatuck river, on the Westerly side, within sight of the first Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house in Hopkinton,) in which I feel more than ordinary interest, as its location was to me but lately known. You will here allow me to relate a family tradition which has been handed down through several generations respecting him.

In the early settlement of this country, a small company left the then infant Colony of Plymouth, to seek a more congenial situation on the coast of Connecticut, then a wilderness, inhabited only by savages. After proceeding up the Sound in a small vessel belonging to the adventurers, they landed and commenced a settlement on one of the inlets of that coast. For greater security against a sudden attack of the Indians, they kept a number of dogs, whose barking forewarned them of danger, and annoyed the savages, who, on some pretence, withdrew their intercourse and trade, and refused to renew it unless the dogs should be confined; upon the doing of which, they assumed a hostile position, and drove the settlers from their dwellings to take refuge in the vsssel which attended them. After waiting till all was quiet, a number of the fugitives returned to their lands to procure some refreshments to enable them to go to some place of safety, when the Indians in ambush surprised and massacred a number of them, and after mutilating their bodies retired. Their companions sought and buried them; and after collecting what they could for their necessities, sailed down the Sound, and landed on Rhode Island, A. D. 1638. About one mile eastward of where the windmills now stand, at Newport, a lonely widow and an infant, the only son of one of the sufferers, erected a dwelling, (and it was one of the first on the Island,) the ruins of which have been pointed out within the last fifty years, and possibly may now be seen. This infant became the patriarch of the families of the name of Maxson. But I believe it has not been generally known to the numerous descendants, nor has the fact till recently been satisfactorily understood, except by a few of the present generation, that in this lonely place rest the remains of that early patriarch, John Maxson, who, at the age of 82 years, died in 1720. From this ancestor descended Jonathan Maxson, who died in 1732, at the age of 52 years, and whose remains lie interred at the same place with his father. From him descended Eld. John Maxson, of the Newport church, who died in 1778, and was interred in that place, and whose history is known to all the churches. His numerous family have at advanced ages all gone to their rest, and their descendants are now among the aged.

For the satisfaction of very many interested in the above, I will add, that John Maxson, senior, was early connected with the Sabbatarian church in Newport, and was a prominent member in an early part of its history; and when the church at Westerly was set off in 1708, he was ordained their pastor, at the age of 70 years. Besides Jonathan, he had several children, among whom was John Maxson, junior, who was also a minister of that church, ordained in 1719, the year prior to the death of his father, and Joseph Maxson, who was ordained and become pastor of the church at Newport. Thus having stated the origin of the family, many of the descendants may find satisfaction in tracing back their lineage to those worthy ancestors, who might not heretofore have had the means here furnished to do so.

THE AGE OF LAND TURTLES.

It is stated in a recent number of the Recorder, that Mr. Elias Bassett, of Hampden, had discovered a land turtle on his farm marked with the initials of his name, E. B., in the year 1800, about half a century ago. This reminds me of a similar relation made by Eld. Joshua Clarke, minister at that time of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church at Hopkinton, R. I. Sitting in his pulpit one Sabbath morning, more than fifty years ago, waiting for the gathering of the people previous to the commencement of divine service, he said he would ask permission to relate what he considered a very remarkable incident that occurred before he left home that morning. One of his children had found and brought in a land turtle, marked with the initials of the man's name who had preceded him on his farm, and dated the year of his (Eld. Clarke's) birth; that he was then in the sixty-sixth year of his age, and that he had no doubt the mark and date were correct.

As to the question, "How many centuries do they live?" I know not who can answer it; but I have no doubt, from the testimony I have received, with my own experience and observation during an acquaintance with their family of sixty years, that their natural term of life will reach one century or more.

Since writing the above, I have met with the following still more extraordinary notice of the land turtle, which I copy from the Philadelphia Times:

"Our readers are aware, that St. Peter's church is undergoing repairs. A singular incident has transpired in the course of the work. There is a space between the flooring of the pews and the earth, of about eighteen inches, principally occupied in supporting the same. In repairing these the workmen found two land turtles, which must be of exceeding age, as there is no possible means of ingress or egress since the church was built, which was in 1761–2. It is known that land turtles live to a great age."

Here then is a case where two of these turtles have existed for a term of eighty-six or eighty-seven years, confined within a space probably not exceeding one hundred feet square, deprived of the rays of the sun, and the moisture from the clouds. What could have been their means of subsistence? I should think but little different from that of the reptile in the cavity of the tree or the centre of the rock. If they can live such a length of time in such a situation, I think you may well talk about centuries as their natural term of life when left to roam unrestrained in their proper elements. J. S.

Shanghai as a Missionary Station.—A letter written in December last, by Mr. Yates, one of the Southern Baptist missionaries, speaks as follows of missionary prospects at Shanghai, China:—

"As I have said, there are five missions, in all fifteen missionaries, at Shanghai, most of whom have families. This, as a mission station, is not surpassed by any in China. We are allowed to go unmolested into any part of the city, and have free access to both male and female. Apart from the facilities we have in the city and country for thirty miles in the interior, this is the key to the entire empire. By water communication, we can send books into all the large cities in the interior. A gentleman called a few days ago, who lived 500 miles in the interior; I gave him a few tracts, two chapters of the Gospel by Matthew. It was gratifying to have the privilege of giving a few words of the Gospel to those who have never heard it, even though we are not able to explain it fully to them. Our time, thus far, has been devoted wholly to the study of this most difficult of all languages. My first object is to learn the colloquial. After that is accomplished, which I suppose will take one year, my attention will be directed to the written language, which is quite different from the colloquial."

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Will some of your correspondents give their views relative to the following: Ought an almost habitual neglect to attend Sabbath meetings with our covenant brethren, unless reasonably hindered, to subject one to the discipline of a church? Also, ought the same neglect of the covenant meeting to be considered in the same manner? A Pastor.

A Baptist College in Missouri.—We learn from the Western Watchman, that a plan is on foot, and is succeeding beyond the expectation of its projectors, to establish a College in Missouri which shall be under the control of the Baptists of that State. The plan is to secure 1,000 persons, or that which will be equivalent, who will pay the interest of $100, at 6 per cent, or six dollars annually, for eight successive years. This is to be invested as it is paid in, upon good security, or in safe stocks, deducting only so much, from year to year, as may be necessary to keep up the instruction at the same time. By accurate calculation, it is found that a College can be endowed, upon this plan, at the end of eight years.

The Mexicans.—An officer of the American army, whose letters have been published in this city, represents the Mexicans as a people who can only be looked upon as a very inferior and degraded portion of the human family. In physical, moral, and intellectual attributes, they are low, very low; in most traits of character inferior to most of our North American Indians. Three-fourths of the inhabitants of that country are in all particulars three-fourths Indians in blood and breeding. While, therefore, the physical matters of Mexico afford a rich and abundant field for the scientific naturalist, the moral subjects present one equally exuberant for the philanthropist, the divine, and the schoolmaster.

Circulation of Methodist Periodicals.—Zion's Herald says that the circulation of the Christian Advocate & Journal has declined, during the last four years, some 6,000; that of the Quarterly Review some 1,000. The Sunday School publications have advanced; the Sunday School Advocate had 40,000 subscribers four years ago, it has now 80,000! The Western Christian Advocate has 11,000 subscribers; this includes, we suppose, the preachers as non-paying subscribers. The Christian Apologist, (German,) has more than 2,300 subscribers. The Sunday School Advocate has a circulation from the Western house of 17,000. The Repository has 8,000 subscribers, though designed particularly for ladies; its patronage is constantly growing.

Methodist Book Concern.—The Christian Repository, a Methodist paper, says, "the capital stock of the entire concern, according to the last report, does not vary much from eight hundred thousand dollars. The yearly profits are said to be about $40,000, and the expenses, including Dr. Bond's salary and others, about $20-000." A very fair sum—and the investment is enabling Methodists to spread their books and papers very widely.

Resources of Benevolent Societies.—The income of most if not all of the voluntary benevolent societies, whose anniversaries were held in New York last spring, was considerably in advance of that of any preceding year. According to the statistics of several annual reports read at the anniversaries, the following is the present financial state of each of the principal societies:—

Novel School.—The N. Y. Tribune says that about two years since a school was established under the patronage of the clergymen of St. John's and St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal churches in this city, the primary object of which was to discipline its pupils in the practice of vocal music, and thus fit them for service in the choirs of those churches; and the collateral object of which was to instruct them in the English branches of study, and rudiments of the French and Latin Languages. The boys were obliged to be of ages not under seven years nor exceeding ten, and their number was limited to thirty; farther, they were required to be boys of moral tendencies. The services of the boys thus rendered were made an equivalent for their tuition. This school is now in existence, and promises to more than realize the high hopes of its founders as to its usefulness and mutual profit, though the number of its attendants hitherto has never reached that designed to be accommodated.

Two whole, live Men!—Under this caption, a correspondent of the Chronotype says that Gerritt Smith has paid, within three or four months, $400 for the redemption of helpless, innocent young females from the clutches of the soul-and-heart traffickers, and $500 for the defense of Drayton and his associates, who periled themselves to assist slaves! Charles Astor Bristed has paid $900, which has been applied to redeem Richard. These are both of them sons of New York. C. A. Bristed is the grandson of the late John Jacob Astor, who was the early personal friend of Mr. Smith's father, the late Judge Peter Smith of Madison Co. $900 each! That will do—who will do likewise? The opportunities are abundant. The treasury of humanity is in pressing need.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

The principal subject before the Senate last week was the Civil and Diplomatic appropriation Bill, in connection with which several speeches were made upon the subject of slavery, pro and con. An amendment was passed to pay $50,000 for the Amistad slaves. A bill was passed to carry into effect the treaty with China. A motion was passed to compensate Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, for buildings used as a Choctaw Academy. Mr. Douglass, of Ill., from the Committee on Territories, reported back to the Senate the House bill in favor of extending a Territorial Government in Oregon, with slight amendments. The Wilmot Proviso was retained, with the preamble assigning its being north of the Missouri Compromise line as a reason therefor. Mr. D. gave notice that he would move to take up the bill on Monday. The report was ordered to be printed with an additional number of copies for the use of the Senate.

In the House of Representatives, the Army Appropriation Bill was under consideration for a long time, being made an occasion to discuss extensively the subject of slavery. On Friday night the Session continued until 12 o'clock. In the course of remarks, G. P. Marsh, of Vt., said he had authority for declaring, that slavery now exists in the territory of Oregon.

Both branches of Congress have agreed to adjourn on the 14th of August.

THE FOREIGN NEWS.

Since our last, two steamships from Europe have arrived at New York, the America and the Hermann, bringing news to July 27.

From Ireland, the news is rather startling. That country seems to be on the eve of an outbreak. The trial of the persons charged with sedition is about to take place, and if there should be an attempt on the part of Government to "pack" the jury, it will probably serve as the signal for revolt. Meanwhile steps are being taken to disarm the people, and place the most dangerous points under martial law.

In France, things are becoming quiet again. The examination of nearly 1,100 insurgents confined in the Fort of Ivry has been concluded, after three weeks' incessant labor on the part of the Magistrates, who had 8,000 documents to examine. It now remains for the military commission to decide on the fate of those men. Arrests continue to take place hourly of persons compromised by the conspiracy. On the 18th, eighteen men, the whole of the male inhabitants of a house in the Faubourg St. Antoine, were arrested and carried off to the Conciergerie. The danger from shots fired in the streets in open day still continues. The death of M. Dornès, the Representative, in consequence of his wounds, is announced.

The Moniteur of Sunday states that the accounts of the numbers killed and wounded in the days of June were, as might be expected, much exaggerated, and gives the following as correct: Killed in the contest or died of wounds then received, 1,400; wounded now in the hospitals and in the private dwellings, 1,100; insurgents now incarcerated, 8,688.

The Hungarians have obtained a victory over the insurgent Illyrians, of whom 300 were killed and many wounded. On the other hand, a battalion of Illyrians have deserted from one of the forts, in order to aid their countrymen. The Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung has letters from Pesth of the 7th inst., from which it appears that the war between the Magyars and Sclavonians is being carried on with unabated fury. The Hungarians are said to have stormed the city of Varsad; but on the other hand they have been defeated near the Wallachian village, St. Mihaly.

Letters from Madrid, Spain, of the 14th, announce that six Carlist officers had been shot at Estella, in Navarre. A body of Carlists had been completely routed in the mountains on the 12th; ten were killed and five taken prisoners, of whom three were officers. Letters direct from the frontiers of Navarre say that the Carlist insurrection has suffered a severe check in the persons of many of the chiefs. Generals Ilzarbe and Zubiri, pursued by the Queen's troops, have been obliged to take refuge in France, as well as Colonels Seto, Enneterio, and Sebirino.

The cholera continued to prevail throughout all the Turkish provinces. At Constantinople it continued without abatement, but it was considered mild. Better sanitary precautions were adopted than hitherto. At Galatz, from the 1st of June to the 8th, 205 were attacked and 63 died. At Ibralla, from the 3d to the 7th of June, 274 cases, of whom 70 died. This is a large proportion in reference to the population of this town, which is only about 20,000; at Viachka, from the 2d to 7th of June, 90 cases, and 21 deaths, in a population of 4,000. It has spread in all Wallachia, and advances rapidly to the frontiers of Transylvania.

IMMIGRANTS ARRIVED.—In the seven months of this year, to 31st July, the whole number of immigrants arrived at this port in vessels from abroad, was 110,404. In the eight previous months, or from the 5th of May, (the time of the organization of the Department of Commissioners of Emigration,) to 31st December, the number was 129,082, being 239,486 in the last fifteen months. From May to December, 1847, there were 53,180 Germans, and 52,496 natives of Ireland; but from December to August, 1848, the number from Ireland has exceeded by some thousands those of Germany. This is owing, no doubt, to the war between Denmark and Germany, and the blockade of the German vessels in the rivers by the Danish fleet. The number arrived in July, 1848, was 24,622, of which 7,963 were from Germany; 11,740 from Ireland; 2,235 England; 1,566 Scotland; 106 France; 34 Holland; 129 Switzerland; 63 Spain; 114 Wales; 492 Norway; 85 Sweden; 91 West Indies; 1 Denmark; 3 South America; 1 Poland. IMPORTANT FROM OREGON.—A telegraphic dispatch to the N. Y. Tribune, dated St. Louis, August 3, says:—

Ten men from St. Josephs have arrived in this city, in eighty-seven days from Oregon Territory. They left the 10th of March.

A battle had been fought between the Indians and the Oregon regiment. The former were defeated, having had fifty killed and a considerable number wounded. Farther pursuit of the Indians was abandoned, on account of want of provisions and ammunition The American, had none killed and only ten wounded.

The Regiment, it was thought, would be successful in defending the Territory, but was in want of supplies of horses, &c.

Col. Gilliam, commanding the Regiment, was accidentally killed after the battle by the discharge of a rifle.

Propositions of peace were entertained by the Indians; but the troubles were not settled. The Government had called for more troops, and reinforcements were anxiously expected from the United States.

The Mormon settlement at Salt Lake was in a flourishing condition. Parties of emigrants were met at Sweet Water.

Col. Garland and Maj. Brant have arrived from Fort Mann. Thirty two Camanche Indians were killed in the engagement with Lieut. Magill's command on the 1st June.

LATEST FROM MEXICO.—The N. Y. Tribune has a dispatch from New Orleans, dated August 2, which says that an arrival from Vera Cruz brings dates from that city to the 26th ult. Intelligence had reached Vera Cruz that another battle had been fought between the Government troops under Gen. Bustamente and the insurgents under Ex-President Paredes. The number of killed and wounded in this engagement is not stated, but the contest resulted in the complete triumph of Bustamente. The Government forces had entered Guanajuato in triumph, and opposition to the present Government is regarded in Mexico as effectually put down. Padre Jarauta was taken prisoner and immediately executed.

INSURRECTION IN CUBA.—The Pensacola Democrat of July 27th, says: "We learn by Captain Thomas E. Miner, of the schooner Governor Bennett, that a smack arrived at Key West the day on which he left for this port, and reported that an insurrection was to have taken place in Havana on the 20th of this month. But fortunately to Governor became apprized of it, and took precautionary steps to arrest it. The insurrectionists, on perceiving that the conspiracy was detected, broke into the stores and forcibly possessed themselves of ammunition, &c. Whereupon the Governor called out the regular troops, and the insurrection was suppressed, after the slaughter of five hundred of the insurrectionists; the remainder were driven to the mountains. Probably exaggerated.

ATTEMPTED INSURRECTION AMONG THE SLAVES OF PORTO RICO.—By the arrival of the bark Cordelia, from Ponce, Porto Rico, whence she sailed on the 24th ult., we learn that on the 18th of July a plot was discovered among the slaves for a general insurrection. It was discovered by information obtained from one or two negroes of an estate, the proprieter of which, on ascertaining the truth of it, immediately gave notice to the proper authorities. Three of the ringleaders were arrested, two were condemned to be shot, and one to the chain gang for ten years. The plan, they said, was an extensive one, and included all the negroes upon the South side of the Island, from Guayama to Mayaguez. The rise was to be simultaneous. The time fixed upon was the last day of the month. They were to burn all the towns, kill all the whites, and make a second St. Domingo of the Island. Since the arrest of the ringleaders confidence was entirely restored.

SUMMARY.

The taverns and grog-shops licensed in the city of New York during the whole of last year were 3,475, and the number of those licensed previous to the 21st of July was 3,116. The number which have been licensed during the present season up to the 21st of July is 3,782, which is an increase of 307 over the total of last year, and 666 over the number licensed up to the corresponding period of last year. The total number of licenses during the present year will probably reach 4,000!

The steamboat White Rose, of Louisville, was totally destroyed by fire at the wharf at Cairo, Illinois, on the 25th ult. She had on board considerable freight, for the carriage of which to New Orleans she was awaiting a boat. The freight, about 200 tons, consisted of lard, corn, potatoes, oats, onions, &c., and was principally owned in Louisville. The safe, containing some $700 or $800, was lost, as the flames spread with such rapidity that nothing could be saved.

The Telegraph line is now open and working to Galena, 500 miles from St. Louis. This line includes stations at Alton, Springfield, Peoria, Peru, Bradstown, Jacksonville, Quincy, and Hannibal, in the State of Illinois, and Burlington, Bloomington, and Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, on the east bank of the Mississippi, the most of which are now open, and doing business.

Lieut. Gov. Reed, of Massachusetts, recently stated before the Legislative Temperance Society, that in 1827, 1,902,915 gallons of distilled spirits were imported and manufactured in Boston—while in 1847, the quantity was reduced to 550,000, being a difference of 1,442,915 gallons.

The town of Orel, in Russia, was destroyed by fire on the 7th of June, and most of the inhabitants lost all they possessed. Upwards of 1,237 houses and four bridges were destroyed. The four stone churches were much injured. The whole loss is estimated at three millions of dollars.

The Sun has late accounts from Chili, stating that Santiago was visited by another destructive fire on the 12th of April. It commenced on the western side of the Plaza de la Independencia, and the flames, spreading with great rapidity, soon enveloped the beautiful row of buildings called the Portal. The loss of goods alone is estimated at half a million of dollars. Two or three lives are said to have been lost. While the fire was raging, a shock of an earthquake occurred. This added to the general alarm, which was farther increased by a second fire breaking out in another part of the city.

Two members of the Massachusetts Regiment, who deserted while encamped on the Matamoras line, are stated to have reached Galveston, Texas, after great privations. A letter from them, received by a soldier of the regiment, states that they suffered greatly on the route, particularly for water, and were obliged to kill one of their horses, and drink his blood! After reaching Galveston, they found Yankees in such demand that they easily obtained employment, one as a schoolmaster, at $60 per month, and the other as a manual laborer, at $45.

The Receivers of the Plainfield Bank cannot pay a dividend out of the funds in their hands until a suit now pending in the Court of Chancery of the State of New Jersey against them, involving almost the entire amount of those funds, is definitely disposed of; but negotiations are now in progress, and the Receivers have every reason to believe will soon be consummated, which will enable them to close up the concern.

The Legislature of Wisconsin has passed through every stage a bill exempting the Homestead of a Family from sale on execution for debt. The area exempted is forty acres in the country, or a quarter of an acre in a village. The final vote in the Senate stood 14 to 5; in the House, 33 to 25.

Mr. John O. Wattles and his wife, are the sole survivors of a community which had been established about 40 miles above Cincinnati, some eighteen months since. A short time ago, at a stave factory in Rochester, N. Y., a cast iron wheel 7 feet in diameter, and weighing about 800 pounds, going almost with the speed of lightning, exploded, and scattered the fragments in every direction. At the time, a boy was on each side feeding it, and fifteen men stood in different places in the immediate vicinity, and strange to say, not one of them was injured! One piece, weighing about 100 pounds, was carried through the roof, and came to the ground some fifteen rods distant, sinking some distance beneath the surface.

☞ Our receipts in advance for the fifth volume have thus far been unusually small. We hope our friends will consider the matter, and not forget that this is the season when we ought to be receiving pretty freely. The money we have recently acknowledged on old accounts, has been required to meet old claims, and we could find use for more "of the same sort."

☞ Several months ago we sent bills to all those who were indebted to us up to the close of the fourth volume. In some cases, we are sorry to learn, those bills have been taken for receipts, and hence the money has not been forthcoming. Please to notice, that a receipt differs from a bill in having the name of the publisher signed to it.

'TIS GOOD TO LIVE.

A THANKSGIVING.

I thank thee, Father, that I live!
I thank thee for these gifts of thine—
For bending skies of heavenly blue,
And stars divine;

For this green earth, where wild, sweet airs,
Like freest spirits, joyous stray—
For winding stream, and trees, and flowers,
Beside its way.

But more I thank thee for true hearts
That bear sweet gifts of love to me,
Whom mine enfolds, and feels that this
Is love of thee.

Warm from their spirits spreads around
An atmosphere serene—divine—
Magnetical, like golden haze,
Encircling mine.

To-day I bless thee most for power—
It draws me, Father, nearest thee—
To love all thine, e'en though they give
No love to me.

In stillness deep I walk a land
Where spirit forms my footsteps greet,
And beauteous thoughts an angel band
Chant low and sweet.

Drear hours I know will darkly come,
Like April days of cloud and rain;
But thus must hearts, like wintry fields,
Grow green again.

I thank thee, Father, that I live!
Though wailings fill this earth of thine;
To labor for thy suffering ones
Is joy divine!

And even I, so weak and poor,
May bear some word of life from Thee;
A beam of hope may reach some heart,
Even through me.

THE TEMPEST ON SHORE.

BY G. D. PRENTICE.

I was never a man of feeble courage. There are few scenes either of human or elemental strife upon which I have not looked with a brow of daring. I have stood in the front of the battle, when swords were gleaming and circling around me like fiery serpents of the air—I have sat on the mountain pinnacle, when the whirlwind was rending its oaks from their rocky cliffs and scattering them piecemeal to the clouds—I have seen these things with a swell-soul, that knew not, that reckoned not danger,—but there is something in the thunder's voice that makes me tremble like a child. I have tried to overcome this unmanly weakness—I have called pride to my aid—I have sought moral courage in the lesson of philosophy—but it avails me nothing—at the first low moaning of the distant cloud, my heart shrinks, quivers, gasps, and dies within me.

My involuntary dread of thunder had its origin in an incident that occurred when I was a boy of ten years. I had a little cousin—a girl of the same age with myself, who had been the constant companion of my childhood. Strange, that after the lapse of so many years, that countenance should be so familiar to me. I can see the bright young creature—her large eyes flashing like a beautiful gem, her free locks streaming as in joy upon the rising gale, and her cheek glowing like a ruby, through a wreath of transparent snow. Her voice had the melody and joyousness of a bird's, and when she bounded over the wooded hill or the fresh green valley, shouting a glad answer to every voice of nature, and clasping her little hands in the very ecstasy of young existence, she loooked as if breaking away like a freed nightingale from the earth, and going off where all things are beautiful and happy like her.

It was a morning in the middle of August. The little girl had been passing some days at my father's house, and she was now to return home. Her path lay across the fields, and I gladly became the companion of her walk. I never knew a summer morning more beautiful and still. Only one little cloud was visible; and that seemed as pure, and white, and peaceful, as if it had been incense smoke of some burning censer of the skies. The leaves hung silent in the woods, the waters in the bay had forgotten their undulations, the flowers were bending their heads as if dreaming of the rainbow and dew, and the whole atmosphere was of such a soft and luxuriant sweetness that it seemed a cloud of roses, scattered down by the hand of a Peri, from the far-off gardens of Paradise. The green earth and the blue sea lay abroad in their boundlessness, and the peaceful sky bent over and blessed them. The little creature at my side was in a delirium of happiness, and her clear sweet voice came ringing upon the air as often as she heard the tones of a favorite bird, or found some strange or lovely flower in her frolic wanderings. The unbroken and almost supernatural tranquillity of the day continued until nearly noon. Then for the first time the indications of an approaching tempest were manifest. Over the summit of a mountain at the distance of about a mile, the folds of a dark cloud became suddenly visible, and at the same instant a hollow roar came down, upon the winds, as it had been the sound of waves in a rocky cavern. The cloud rolled out like a banner-fold upon the air, but still the atmosphere was as calm and the leaves as motionless as before, and there was not even a quiver upon the sleeping waters to tell of the coming hurricane.

To escape the tempest was impossible. As the only resort, we fled to an oak that stood at the foot of a tall and ragged precipice. Here we remained and gazed almost breathlessly upon the clouds, marshaling themselves like bloody giants in the sky. The thunder was not frequent, but every burst was so fearful that the young creature who stood by me shut her eyes convulsively, clung with desperate strength upon my arm, and shrieked as if her very heart would break. A few moments and the storm was upon us. During the height of its fury, the little girl lifted her finger toward the precipice that towered above us. I looked up, and an amethystine flame was quivering upon its grey peaks! and the next moment the clouds opened, the rocks tottered to their foundations, a roar like the groan of a Universe filled the air, and I felt myself blinded and thrown I knew not whither. How long I remained insensible I cannot tell, but when consciousness returned, the violence of the tempest was abating, the roar of the winds dying in the tree-tops, and the deep tones of the cloud coming in fainter murmurs from the eastern hills. I arose, and looked tremblingly and almost deliriously around. She was there—the idol of my infant love, stretched out on the wet green earth. After a moment of irresolution, I went up and looked upon her. The handkerchief upon her neck was slightly rent, and a single dark spot upon her bosom told where the pathway of death had been. At first I clasped her to my breast with a cry of agony, and gazed upon her face, almost with a feeling of calmness. Her bright disheveled ringlets clustered sweetly around her brow, the look of terror had faded from her lips, and infant smiles were pictured sweetly there! the red rose tinge upon her cheek was lovely as in life, and as I pressed it to my own the fountain of tears was opened, and I wept as if my heart were waters. I have but a dim recollection of what followed—I only know, that I remained weeping and motionless till the coming of twilight, and that I was then taken tenderly by the hand, and led away where I saw the countenance of parents and sister.

Many years have gone by on the wings of light and shadow, but the scenes I have portrayed still come over me, at times, with a terrible distinctness. The oak yet stands at the base of the precipice, but its limbs are black and dead, and the hollow truuk looking upward to the sky, as if 'calling to the clouds for drink,' is an emblem of rapid and noiseless decay. A year ago I visited the spot, and the thoughts of by-gone years came mournfully back to me—thoughts of the little beautiful tree of Spring, rent up by the whirlwind in the midst of its blossoming. But I remembered—and oh! there was joy in the memory!—that she had gone where no lightnings slumber in the folds of the rainbow cloud, and where the sunlight waters are broken only by the storm-breath of Omnipotence.

My readers will understand why I shrink in terror from the thunder. Even the consciousness of security is no relief to me—my fears have assumed the nature of an instinct, and seem indeed a part of my existence.

THE FIVE PEACHES.

A Peasant returning from the city brought home with him five peaches, the most beautiful ones which he could find. It was the first time that his children had ever seen this fruit. Therefore they admired them and were delighted with their red cheeks and delicate down. The father then divided them among his four children, reserving one for their mother.

At evening, before the children went into their sleeping room, their father asked them, 'Well, how have the peaches tasted?'

'Deliciously, dear father,' said the eldest. 'They are fine fruit, so juicy and sweet I have carefully kept the stone, and I will plant it and rear a tree.'

'Good,' replied the father; 'that is acting prudently, and caring for the future as becomes a farmer.'

'I ate mine up at once, and threw away the stone,' said the youngest, 'and mother gave me half of hers.'

'Well,' said the father, 'you have not acted very wisely, but still natural and like a child. Wisdom will come by-and-by.'

The second son then said—'I picked up the stone which little brother threw away, and cracked it. There was a kernel in it just like a nut. But I sold my peach, and received for it money enough to buy twelve when I go the city.'

The father shook his head, and said—'It was wisely done, indeed, but it was not natural nor child-like. I think you are destined to be a merchant,'

'And you, Edmund?'—asked the father. Edmund answered frankly and carelessly—'I carried my peach to our neighbor's son, the sick George, who is ill of a fever. He refused to take it. Then I laid it upon his bed, and came home.'

'Well,' said the father, 'and who has made the best use of his peach?'

Then all three cried out—'Brother Edmund!'

But Edmund was silent, and his mother embraced him with tears in her eyes.

CHINESE DELICACIES.

Oils are extracted from the olive, sesame, cotton seed, several kinds of cabbage, pork fat, and fish, which, together with the castor oil, are all used for culinary purposes. The use of the latter for any purpose other than a medicine, is, I should suppose, peculiar to the Chinese; it is expressed through a cullender, and, when fresh, has not the aroma that it afterwards acquires. Ducks' eggs are in great requisition, and in order to meet the demand for them, great numbers are kept on all the navigable rivers and canals, in floating poultry houses. They are under very remarkable discipline; they go out to feed, and return home with remarkable expedition, and at a word from their masters will do almost any thing that can be required of them; he stands meanwhile at the entrance, and flogs the straggler and rewards the foremost. They are never allowed to hatch their own eggs, almost all towns having ovens for that purpose. The eggs of all birds are used, but those of the ducks are salted in the shells, as is the flesh also, for sea stores—considerable quantities of fish are salted and dried. The collared eel is very fine, but none are thrown away, even the blubber is eaten, as are water-snakes, frogs, toads, shell-fish of every species, tortoises, snails, gelatinous worms, and lizards. The various grains are used in making unleavened bread, (not unlike a muffin in appearance,) cooked on the side of a portable oven, and generally by steam, together with pastry of divers sorts, among which are some very similar to Europeans, as water, sponge-cakes, &c., which would be palatable enough were it not for the introduction of a lump of pork fat, discoverable only by the uninitiated, at a most disagreeable period. The introduction of pork fat into these articles of Chinese gastronomy is universal and disgusting. Imported are ginseng, a kind of liquorice, which was formerly a royal monopoly, and could only be grown on the Emperor's property in the north, but has latterly been introduced from Canada, and some parts of the United States; and birds' nests of the sea swallow, a transparent substance, in appearance somewhat resembling a gum, reckoned a great delicacy, and sold at very high prices. I have seen four or five, when very clear, weighing only three or four ounces each, sell for thirty dollars. They are brought from the islands of the Eastern Archipelago, as likewise are beches de-mer, or sea-slugs, brown-looking snails, about six or seven inches long. They are an expensive luxury, as are the exotic dainties of roses, sounds, tripe, fins and tails of sharks. "In fact, a Chinaman will eat everything but his own father." [Forbes' Five Years in China.

SELF-MADE MEN.

"If you are to be an exception," said Mr. Crabbe to his young friend, "you will be the first in all my observation and experience. You may take the whole population of Maryland, and select from it the fifty men who are most distinguished for talents, or any description of public usefulness, and I will answer for it, they are all, every one of them, men who began in the world without a dollar. Look into the public councils of the nation, and who are they that take the lead there? They are men who made their own fortunes—self-made men, who began with nothing. The rule is universal. It pervades our Courts, State and Federal, from the highest to the lowest. It is true of all the professions. It is so now; it has been so at any time since I have known the public men of this State or the nation; and it will be so while our present institutions continue. You must throw a man upon his own resources to bring him out. The struggle which is to result in eminence is too arduous, and must be continued too long, to be encountered and maintained voluntarily, or unless as a matter of life and death. He who has fortune to fall back upon will soon slacken from his efforts, and finally retire from the competition. With me it is a question whether it is desirable that a parent should leave his son any property at all. You will have a large fortune, and I am sorry for it, as it will be the spoiling of a good lawyer. These are my deliberate sentiments, and I shall be rejoiced to find, in your instance, I shall be mistaken."

A SAMPLE OF MOHAMMEDAN MATRIMONY.

Another girl attended the school for five years. In her twentieth year she was married by her mother to a Mohammedan Fakeer. On the day of their marriage her husband took a walk; and this was rather a long one, for he did not return for two years. In the meanwhile the girl returned to school, where she became a converted character. On Sunday, when I baptized a number of girls, she presented herself among them; and when Mr. Smith said to her, 'We dare not baptize you, as it is against the Mohammedan law,' she burst into tears, and wept bitterly. After the service, I comforted her by telling her that I would baptize her on the following Sunday, at the hazard of being imprisoned by the magistrate. I did so. Not many weeks after, her husband came and claimed his wife; but she refused to return to him. At this he was very much annoyed, and said, 'I paid your mother five rupees for you; what shall I now do? Return me the money, and you may stay, for I care not for you, but I want the five rupees.' The poor girl went to Mrs. Smith, and begged the loan of five rupees, stating, that she would work day and night to repay them. Mrs. Smith came and spoke to the man, and told him, if he would give her a bill of divorcement, she would give him eight rupees. The man was overjoyed; he quickly wrote it, and, according to law, his wife was free. The girl's name was Mary. She now acts as teacher in the Orphan School. She has, since then, succeeded in persuading her mother to come also to the School, and she is at present employed in the girls' kitchen, and receiving Christian instruction. Thus, the girl was not only instructed and converted herself, but has been the means of bringing her mother under the sound of the Gospel.

CURIOUS CHEMICAL EXPERIMENTS.

To Change the Color of a Rose.—Hold a red rose over the blue flame of a common match, and the color will be discharged wherever the fume touches the leaves of the flower, so as to render it beautifully variegated, or entirely white. If it be then dipped into water, the redness, after a time, will be restored.

Magic Dye.—Nearly fill a wine-glass with the juice of beet-root, which is of a deep red color; add a little lime-water, and the mixture will be colorless; dip into it a piece of white cloth, dry it rapidly, and in a few hours the cloth will become red.

A Solid from Two Liquids.—Dissolve muriate of lime in water until it will dissolve no more;—make also a similar solution of carbonate of potash; both will be transparent fluids; but if equal quantities of each be mixed and stirred together, they will become a solid mass.

Magic Writing.—Dissolve a small portion of green-copperas in water, and soak in it sheets of writing-paper so as to allow them to be taken out whole, and then dried; then cover the paper with very finely powdered galls, and write on it with a pen dipped in water; when dry, brush off the galls, and the writing will appear.

Pleasing Experiment.—Mix a little solution of subacetate of lead with port wine; filter the mixture through blotting paper, and a colorless liquid will pass through; to this add a small quantity of dry salt of tartar, when a spirit will rise, which may be inflamed on the surface of the water. An Honest Boy.—That "honesty is the best policy," was illustrated, some years since, under the following circumstances, detailed in the Rochester Democrat. A lad was proceeding to an uncle's, to petition for aid for a sick sister and her children, when he found a wallet containing fifty dollars. The aid was refused, and the distressed family were pinched for want. The boy revealed the fortune to his mother, but expressed a doubt about using any portion of the money. His mother confirmed the resolution, the pocket-book was advertised, and the owner found. Being a man of wealth, upon learning the history of the family, he presented the fifty dollars to the sick mother, and took the boy into his service, and he is now one of the most successful merchants in Ohio. Honesty always brings its reward—to the mind if not to the pocket.

The Emperor of Russia's Family.—The family of the Emperor Nicholas, consisting of four sons and three daughters, were brought up from the cradle by English nurses and governesses, under the superintendence of an old Scotch woman, who was the under-nurse to the present Emperor in his infancy. This individual held the rank of a general officer, (for everything in Russia is measured by a military scale,) and had been decorated with the order of St. Andrew ennobled and enriched. This woman, nevertheless, went a bare-legged servant-girl to Russia, some five and fifty years ago, with a Scotch trader's family, who turned her adrift in St. Petersburg. A lucky chance procured her the station of an under nursery maid in the Emperor Paul's family, when she was placed about the person of the present Emperor to teach him to speak English! His attachment for her was so great, that when he was married, he placed her at the head of his nursery establishment, where she has gone through all the military gradations of rank to her present one of general.

A Newspaper.—A man eats up a pound of sugar, and the pleasure he has enjoyed is ended; but the information he gets from a newspaper is treasured up in the mind, to be enjoyed anew, and to be used whenever occasion or inclination calls for it. A newspaper is not the wisdom of one man, or two men; it is the wisdom of the age, and of past ages too.

A family without a newspaper is always half an age behind the times in general information, besides they never think much, or find much to talk about. And then there are little ones growing up in ignorance, without any taste for reading.

Besides all these evils, there 's the wife, who, when her work is done, has to sit down with her hands in her lap, and nothing to amuse her, or divert her mind from the toils and cares of the domestic circle. Who, then, would be without a newspaper? [Benjamin Franklin.

Palpitation of the Heart—Tea, Coffee, and Tobacco.—Professor W. Parker, of the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, at a recent clinical lecture, examined a man who was troubled with palpitation of the heart. The report states that no physical signs of organic disease of the heart could be detected; and hence we may conclude, says Prof. P., "with much certainty, that all the cardiac disturbance is purely functional, depending on derangement of the digestive organs—and this organ depending on the free use of tobacco, tea, and coffee, and confinement within doors." What then are the indications of treatment? Shall we give physic in such a case? Will physic cure bad habits? Not a bit of it. Let the patient simply throw away his tobacco, his tea, and his coffee; adopt a plain, wholesome diet, and take regular exercise in the open air, and he will soon be well; in a word, remove the causes of derangement and the effects will cease.

VARIETY.

Irish towns are generally small, modern, and their outlines, on the whole, regular. Their site is usually spacious and airy, and their centres contain a fair modicum of good houses. Their outskirts, or suburbs, are composed of long rows of low-walled thatched hovels, dark, damp, and smoky. Here live the peasantry, who hold patches of land in the neighborhood. The cottage economy of Ireland is mournfully at fault; and while it excites pity, provokes comparisons the reverse of favorable toward those who, did they even use the means within their reach as they ought, might considerably increase their domestic comfort.

A son of the Emerald Isle, who arrived at New York the other day, was asked to take a glass of grog, but declined, giving as a reason for his refusal, that he joined the Temperance Society in Cork, before he left Ireland. His friend replied that was no consequence, as a pledge given in Ireland was not binding here. To this piece of left-handed morality, Pat indignantly retorted—"Do ye suppose whin I brought me body to America, I'd be afther laving me sowl in Ireland?"

The Albany Cultivator observes: "It seeems to be well established, that June is the best month to transplant evergreens in this latitude. We know of several trials of white pines in this month which have succeeded better than any we have known transplanted earlier. They require, as well as all resinous trees, great care in taking up, being more injured in cutting the roots than hardwood trees. As much earth as practicable should be left round the roots, and they should not be suffered to dry before they are again put in ground."

An artful creature. She got Mr. Jones by her cunning. He was a timid young man, and very bashful, and did not come up to the scratch, as my brother John calls it; so after she had showed me a letter she had written to him, and the artful creature spelled her Christian name with two "r's," so that it read thus, "Marry Ann Smith," and the poor creature took the hint, and did marry Ann Smith.

A young English traveler contracted in Valencia a love affair with a pretty gipsy girl. The mother wished he should marry her at once; but the Englishman declared that he was not rich enough to keep a wife. "What?" said the gipsy, laughing, "not rich enough in the land of guineas? With so renowned a thief as my daughter, you will in a year be a millionaire."

Amongst our idustrious and frugal forefathers, it was a maxim, that a young woman should never be married until she had spun herself a set of body, table, and bed linen. From this custom, all unmarried women were termed spinsters, as is still the appellation in law proceedings.

Life is shortened by indulgence in anger, ill-will, anxiety, envy, grief, sorrow, and excessive care. The vital powers are wasted by excessive bodily exercise in some cases, and want of a due portion in others.

In a letter dated June 14, 1785, preserved in the Bodleian collection, it is stated that a zealous naturalist named Vernon, followed a butterfly nine miles before he could catch it.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

BOARD OF INSTRTCTION.

W. C. KENYON, A. M., }
IRA SAYLES, A. M., } Principals.

As isted by nine able and experienced Teachers, five in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past ten years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to also continue to merit a share of public patronage

Extensive buildings are now erected for the accommodation of students, and for Recitation and Lecture Rooms, &c. They occupy an eligible position, and are finished in the best style of modern architecture; and the different apartments are heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical

Ladies and Gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board and rooms can also be had in private families, if particularly desired.

Each room for those who board in the Hall is furnished with a bed and bedding, a table, two chairs, and a pail.

The plan of instruction adopted in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the student, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The Health, the Manners, and the Morals of our Students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

REGULATIONS.

1. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.
2. Punctuality in attending all regular Academic exercises will be required.
3. The use of Tobacco, for chewing or smoking, will not be allowed either in or about the Academic buildings.
4. Playing at games of chance cannot be allowed.
5. Using profane language cannot be allowed.
6. The use of any kind of intoxicating drinks cannot be allowed, unless prescribed in case of sickness, by a regular physician.
7. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, cannot be permitted.
8. Gentlemen and ladies of the Institution will not be permitted to visit the rooms of the opposite sex, except in cases of imperious necessity, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.
9. Good order must be maintained at all times, and in all the rooms and halls of the Institution, and in all the intercourse of students with each other.
10. All students are required to retire regularly at the ringing of the bell designated for that purpose, as occasion may require; and to rise at the ringing of the morning bell, also designated.
11. Any room, occupied by students, will, at all times, be subject to the visitation of the Teachers of the Institution, who are required to see that the regulations are complied with.
12. Students will be required to keep their own rooms in good order, and to pay all unnecessary damages, either of rooms or of furniture furnished with the rooms.

REGULAR ACADEMIC EXERCISES.

The regular exercises, at which all the students will be required to attend, unless specially excused, are, Chapel exercises each morning during the term; Recitations, from two to four, five days each week, from Monday morning till Friday evening. Compositions and Declamations, one-half day, once in two weeks, Literary, Scientific, and Moral Lectures by the Principals. Public Worship, once in each week, either on Saturday or Sunday, according as the students may be in the habit of keeping the Sabbath, either on the seventh or first day of the week.

GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the students will be in the hands of the Principals, and will be strictly and steadily exercised, and at the same time, strictly parental. The object of our academic government being to secure the greatest possible amount of physical, intellectual, and moral good to the students themselves, regularity and order of exercises, and good and wholesome citizens to society. No unwarrantable means will be made use of to enforce the observance of the above regulations; yet our constant endeavor will be, to make the means resorted to as effective as humun means may be.

Parents who place their children in this Institution, and all students who are sufficiently old to understand the necessity of order, cannot be too well assured that the foregoing regulations form the most essential part of the contract between them and us; and that whatever student wantonly violates them, and shows himself incorrigibly determined on pursuing his waywardness, will be expelled from the privileges of the Institution, and will not be permitted to re-enter it again, without special proof of reformation. Nor will an expelled student have any deduction made from full term charges.

Farther, parents are requested not to place money for expenses, in the hands of students who are not old enough to use money with discretion and economy. Either of the Principals, or the Book-keeper of the Institution, will act as fiscal guardian of such students without charge.

ADMISSION.

Candidates for admission as students, must present testimonials of good moral character, or be known to possess such a character, and must be willing to comply unreservedly with the foregoing regulations; and no one will be permitted to receive instructions in any class, until all academic bills, for the term in prospect, be paid or satisfactorily arranged.

ACADEMIC TERMS.

The Academic Year for 1848–9 consists of three terms, as follows:

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1848, and ending Thursday, November 23, 1848.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, December 5, 1848, and ending Thursday, March 15, 1849.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, April 3, 1849, and ending July 12, 1849.

As the plan of instruction in this Institution, laid out for each class, will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue through the term, and accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the terms.

N. B. Students who are expecting to teach during the winter or summer, will specify such intention on entering in the beginning of the fall or spring term; and, for the special accommodation of such, a day will be set apart at first, on which they can leave, if they wish; and they will not be permitted to leave on any other day, nor will any other than teachers be permitted to leave on the day specified.

Farther, it is of the utmost importance that the student be present at the day of the opening of the term, as on that and the succeeding day, the students entering are examined and classified.

It is also suggested to parents who patronize this Institution from the distance of a few miles around, that students should go home only once during the term, as every absence from classes is always attended with disadvantages to the student. This is a suggestion, and not imperative. But to meet this suggestion, the exercise of the school will close at noon on the seventh Friday in each term, and open again on the afternoon of Monday following.

EXPENSES.

THE JUDGES JUDGED—NO. 2.

THE QUESTION AT ISSUE.

The question brought before the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania, by the Seventh-day Baptists, in the person of a brother Specht, of the Snowhill Society, was not what was the meaning and intent of the Sunday Statute of that State? This had been ascertained by repeated convictions under it, suffered by the brethren there. They were convicted, not for injury done to their neighbors, or for any interruption of any Christian person's devotions, but for doing their own "worldly employment or business on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday." The question, as stated by the counsel, and admitted by the Court in the opening of the Judge's "Opinion," was on the constitutionality of the Act in question, as it was construed and made to operate upon the conscientious practice of the Seventh-day Baptists. The plain and obvious import of the statute of 22d of 4th month, 1794, is, that "worldly employment or business done on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday," is a profanation of a holy institution—a sacred day. The terms employed to designate the day are religious appellations of such well-known signification as never to admit of a question respecting the character in which the Legislature considered the day. It is evident, that they took the day in the popular sense in which the mass of the people and their religious teachers considered it. The terms Lord's day, and Sunday, are used in the obvious sense of the standard theologians and religious teachers of the day; and we venture to affirm, that there was not one of the people, nor of the representatives of the people, who called for the enactment of that law, who asked for it in any other light than as doing reverence to a holy institution—a sacred day. It was under pretence of honor to the Supreme Being, and of maintaining inviolate the popular opinion respecting Christian morals, that the law was enacted. It is under the pretence of protecting Christian morals, and of punishing vice, that it is enjoined upon magistrates to enforce the statute in question. Indeed, so palpably plain is the meaning and intent of the law, that no intelligent man can mistake it. The idea of "a civil regulation made for the government of man as a member of society," was not the consideration which induced the enactment of the law in question. Had it been so, as pretended by the Judge, the statute would doubtless have named the interests and relations of society; but as the law reads, it names and regards none but religious considerations—the profanation of the Lord's day, and the suppression of vice. Hence the law is as applicable to a man working in the seclusion of his own farm, and in the bosom of his own society of like faith with himself, as to a man who should work within the purlieu of a Presbyterian meeting-house. Indeed, this was the case with the brethren at Snowhill; they were at work on their own farms, and within the hearing or observation of no religious congregation but their own; and the wretched men who informed against them, were the tavern-haunters of the day—the blood-hounds of satan, to hunt the flock of Christ—more savage than the Cuban blood-hounds that were employed in the Seminole war. No other denomination of Christians have made so much effort, or had so much influence, in inducing the enactment of the Sunday laws, or have called louder for their enforcement, than the Presbyterians; and we affirm, without fear of successful contradiction, that there is not a writer among them, or a treatise of any authority in their ecclesiastical courts, which treats the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, as "but a civil regulation, made for the government of man as a member of society." In an address to magistrates, put forth by members of that denomination, and under the sanction of a society whose avowed object is to procure the enforcement of Sunday laws, the following appeal is made:—

"Honored and respected rulers of the land, our final appeal is to you. The Scriptures teach us to regard you as ministers of God for good to this great people; and how can you so effectually secure their enduring prosperity, as by exerting your influence to make them virtuous? And what institution was ever so preëminently calculated to effect this object as the Christian Sabbath? As a school of morals—it stands far, very far, above every other. . . . But for the moral power of sabbatical institutions, whose property or reputation would be safe a single day? Who would be found to execute the laws against any kind of immorality, or what would hinder them from being repeated? Much as the Lord's day is profaned in this country, even now, it does tenfold more than all our magistrates and prisons, and other legal terrors, to perpetuate and multiply our social, civil, and religious blessings. Take away this barrier, and you open at once all the flood-gates of vice and irreligion upon a godless and suffering people."

The question at issue was, whether this law, so understood by the people, so construed by courts, and so enforced against conscientious men, who believed differently from the mass of their fellow-citizens, was not at variance with the Constitution of the State, which ordains that "no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and no preference shall be given by law to any religious establishment or modes of worship." That the court understood the question as we do, though they have seen fit to construe it otherwise, is obvious from the language of the "Opinion." The Judge remarks, "The Constitution of this State secures freedom of conscience and equality of religious right." "Does the Act of Assembly in question impinge upon this natural right, or on the constitutional declaration which seeks to foster and protect it." "Though it may have been a motive with the law-makers to prohibit the profanation of a day regarded by them as sacred—and certainly there are expressions used in the statute that justify their conclusion!" Such is the language of the Judge. Was there ever an admission made more to the point than this? Was there ever anything clearer than this, that the Judge understood that the question at issue was between a statutory obligation to observe a religious day, a sacred institution, against one's conscientious belief, and "this natural right and constitutional declaration," that "no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience?" How then could the Judge proceed to say, "It it is not perceived how this fact can vitally affect the question at issue." It is no wonder to us, that the Court delayed from time to time the publication of such an "Opinion!" Where the Judge found casuistry enough to encourage the publication of such an "Opinion," we cannot say. There appears, however, a designed relation between the words impinge and vitally; and on this ground there may be a mental change of the question. It is not supposed that the Legislature designed, by the Act in question, to strike against the rights of conscience, or that the Court intended to dash with force against the vital provisions of the Constitution. But the question was whether it worked contrary thereto. Now it is very obvious that the Court dodged this vital question at issue, and raised one to suit its own purpose. Instead of deciding whether the Constitution does admit of enforcing by penalties a religious observance upon citizens who conscientiously dissent therefrom, the Judge decides, that "to the well being of society, periods of rest are absolutely necessary,"—"they may be established by common consent, or, as is conceded, the legislative power of the State may, without impropriety, interfere to fix the time of their stated return, and enforce obedience to the direction!" So William the Conquorer, of England, in the eleventh century, thought the people needed periods of rest, and ordained the curfew-bell to tell when they should put out their lights at night. So the Parliament of Great Britain have limited the hours of labor for factory children. But is this the same question as the enforcement of the Christian Sabbath? Will the strict observers of the Lord's Day, the Christian Sabbath, thank the Judge for his Opinion, which places this institution, per authority, upon the same basis as a "civil regulation made for the government of man as a member of society?"

The Judge could not bear to appear to sympathize with religious bigots and persecutors, nor did he like to meet the clamor of the clergy. Disavowing, therefore, its religious character, he says it is but a "civil regulation," agreed upon by common consent, and sanctioned by the Legislature; its observance must be enforced by their direction. When the Jews carried our Saviour's case up to the Court of Pilate, he found nothing in the laws to condemn him; but, unable to stop the clamor of the priests and of the people, he deferred setting him at liberty, and at length, overcome by their importunity, he "gave sentence that it should be as they required." Whether Judge Bell was in this predicament, we leave our readers to decide.

That the Constitution was intended to shield the Jew as well as the Christian from the imposition of every species of religious faith and observance, is admitted by the Judge. He says, "No man, living under the protection of our institutions, can be coerced to profess any form of religious belief, or to practice any peculiar mode of worship, in preference to another. In this respect the Christian, the Jew, the Mahommedan and the Pagan are alike entitled to protection." Yet when the Seventh-day Baptist refuses to pay the silent homage of rest from "worldly employment and business" to the so-called Lord's day, he is fined four dollars and costs; and although Judge Bell cannot condemn him therefor, he gives sentence that it shall be as the statute of the Legislature requires. It is a most pitiful subterfuge to which the Judge resorts, when he says, "In a Christian community, where a large majority of the people celebrate the first day of the week, as their chosen period of rest from labor, it is not surprising that that day should receive the legislative sanction." If the Constitution was ever intended to have any practical effect, it was doubtless intended to protect the conscientious few from the imposition of the many. This paragraph is doubtless an index to the working of the matter in the Judge's own mind. He might well add, "And as it is also devoted to religious observances, we are prepared to estimate the reason why the statute should speak of it as the Lord's day, and denominate the infraction of its legalized rest a profanation." The Judge means, doubtless, that it was in accordance with popular sentiment that it was so denominated, and the law enacted; and that on the same principle the Court had decided to sustain the conviction. Such a mode of interpreting fundamental law, is like a swivel in a chain; it works all round, and there is no danger of its being twisted up. Such a principle, however, is odious in the extreme, when applied to a question affecting the institutions of religion, and the fundamental rights of the people. Our brethren there may well adopt the language of the Apostle to the Gentiles, and say, "Brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified, even as it is with you, and that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men, for all men have not faith."

ENDURANCE.

BY ROBERT JOSELYN.

'Tis bitter to endure the wrong
 Which evil hands and tongues commit,
The bold encroachments of the strong,
 The shafts of calumny and wit;
The scornful bearing of the proud,
The sneer and laughter of the crowd.

And harder still it is to bear
 The censure of the good and wise,
Who, ignorant of what you are,
 Or blinded by the slanderer's lies,
Look coldly on, or pass you by
In silence, with averted eye.

But when the friends in whom your trust
 Was steadfast as the mountain rock,
Fly, and are scattered like the dust,
 Before misfortune's whirlwind shock,
Nor love remains to cheer your fall,
This is more terrible than all.

But even this and these—aye more,
 Can be endured and hope survive;
The noble spirit still may soar,
 Although the body fails to thrive;
Disease and want may wear the frame—
Thank God! the soul is still the same.

Hold up your head, then, man of grief,
 Nor longer to the tempest bend;
Or soon or late must eome relief,
 The coldest, darkest night must end;
Hope in the true heart never dies!
Trust on, the day-star yet shall rise.

Conscious of purity and worth,
 You may with calm assurance wait
The tardy recompense of earth,
 And e'en should justice come too late
To soothe the spirit's homeward flight,
Still Heaven, at last, the wrong shall right.

THE PLOUGHBOY AND THE PRESIDENT.

The President of a well-known College in Kentucky, was one morning, while sitting in his study, astonished by the entrance of a single visitor.

The visitor was a boy of some seventeen years, rough and uncouth in his appearance, dressed in coarse homespun, with thick, clumsy shoes on his feet, an old tattered felt hat on his head, surmounting a mass of uncombed hair, which relieved swarthy and sunburnt features, marked by eyes quick and sparkling, but vacant and inexpressive from the want of education. The whole appearance of the youth was that of an untaught, uncultivated ploughboy.

The President, an affable and venerable man, inquired into the business of the person who stood before him.

"If you please, sir," said the ploughboy, with all the hesitancy of an uneducated rustic—"If you please, sir, I'd like to get some larnin'. I heard that you had a college in these parts, and I thought if I would work a spell for you, you would help me now and then in gettin' an edication."

"Well, my young friend," replied the President, "I scarcely see any way in which you might be useful to us. The request is something singular."

"Why, I can bring water, cut wood, or black boots," interrupted the boy, his eyes brightening with earnestness. "I want to get an edication—I want to make something of myself. I don't keer how hard I work, only so as to get an edication. I want—"

He paused, at a loss for words to express his ideas, but there was a language in the expressive lip and glancing eye; there was a language in his manner—in the tone in which these words were spoken, that appealed at once to the President's feelings. He determined to try the sincerity of the youth. "I am afraid, my young friend, I can do nothing for you. I would like to assist you, but I see no way in which you can be useful to us at present."

The President resumed his book. In a moment he glanced at the ploughboy, who sat silent and mute, holding the handle of the door. He fingered his rough hat confusedly with one hand, his eyes were downcast, and his upper lip quivered and trembled as though he were endeavoring to repress strong and sudden feelings of intense disappointment. The effort was but half successful. A tear, emerging from the downcast eye-lid, rolled over the sunburnt cheek, and with a quick, nervous action, the ploughboy raised his toil-hardened hand, and brushed away the sign of regret. He made a well-meant but awkward mark of obeisance, and opening the door, had one foot across the threshold, when the President called him back.

The ploughboy was in a few minutes hired as a man of all work, and boot-black to the —— College.

The next scene which we give the reader, is in a new and magnificent church, rich with the beauties of architecture, and thronged by an immense crowd, who listened in death-like silence to the burning eloquence of the minister of heaven, who delivered the mission of his Master from the altar. The speaker was a man in the full glow of middle age—of striking and impressive appearance—piercing and intellectual eye, and high intellectual forehead. Every eye is fixed on him—every lip hushed; and every ear, with nervous intensity, drinks in the eloquent teaching of the orator.

Who in all that throng would recognize in the famed, the learned, the eloquent President of —— College, Pennsylvania, the humble boot-black of —— College, in Kentucky.

NEW YORK AS IT IS.

In the vicinity of New York there is a cemeterey in which are always to be found more or less graves in a continuous row, open and ready for their tenants. The sexton is in attendance, and we have seen funeral after funeral enter and bury their dead in the row, and leave them unmarked, and of course forgotten. The keeper's little book, in which a pencil entry is made, is the only record of the fact, so far as we have known. And every day the row increases in length, and another and another row is added across the broad field. It was at first a shocking sight,—that indiscriminate companionship. But as we grew accustomed to it in our daily ride or walk, we began to notice the faces of those who brought their dead to that (literal) field of oblivion.

We stood an hour at the end of the row, and saw three funeral processions. Each was small, for few besides the poor consent to such entombing. The first was a somewhat sorrowful company. We learned that a widow and her sister were hiding out of sight the widow's oldest child. Two other children were with them, weeping bitterly. A few true hearted friends sustained the sorrowing family.

Scarcely had they left the ground when the second train approached, and now a man was buried. There were no tears shed here. It was a business-like affair, and none but men were in attendance. They filled the grave, and exchanging some words of whose import we could gather nothing, turned away.

Ten minutes later two carriages dashed swiftly into the gate. The door of one opened, and a gentleman sprang out and seemed engaged in conversing with the sexton. There was an exchange of papers, probably physician's certificates, or the inspector's permit. As we walked slowly by, we saw the faces of two females in one carriage. The windows of the other remained closed. At length a small coffin was handed from the former, and two ladies alighted and another gentleman. The four followed it to a grave, saw it lowered to the bottom, and without waiting to throw a handful of earth on it, without prayer, or uplifted eye, or sob, or tear, all hastily re-entered the carriage and drove as rapidly away as they had come. The stolid sexton filled the little grave, and made a pencil note of the occurrence, and turned to await the next weary comer to this fearful place of rest.

Such is a burial in this Christian land, and Christian city. We have laid our friends down peacefully, and with somewhat of consolation, in the old country grave yards; but it would be very hard for us to bury one we had loved in that Golgotha. True, they will not heed the tempest, or the earthquake, any more there than under a covering of violets in the haunts familiar during life; nor, though we are unable to find them again, will God fail to find them in the day of gathering. But we prefer some better memorial of their lives and deaths than that sexton's book and short wood pencil, worn out with writing down the fearful record he keeps.

A GREEK FUNERAL.

I remember when they buried that bright-eyed Greek maiden, snatched suddenly from earth, when her young heart was light as her face was fair; they arrayed her, so rigid and motionless, in the gay dress she had never worn but for some great fete or gala, as though this, more than any, were a duty of rejoicing for her; and thus attired, with her long hair spread out over her still bosom, all decked with flowers, they laid her uncoffined in her grave. At her feet they placed a small flask of wine, and a basket of corn, in accordance with an ancient Greek superstition, which supposes that for three days and nights, the disembodied spirit lingers mournfully round its tenement of clay, the garment of its mortality, wherein, as a pilgrim and a stranger on the earth, it lived and loved, it sinned and suffered!

As soon as the first symptom of decay announces that the curse of corruption is at work, they believe that the purer essence departs to purer realms. Before the grave was closed, whilst for the last time the warm radiance of the sunset cast a glow like the mockery of life, over the marble face of the poor young girl, her friends, as a last precaution, took measures to ascertain that she was actually dead, and not in a swoon. The means they always take in such instances, to ascertain a fact which elsewhere would be ensured by a doctor's certificate, is touching in the extreme; the person whom, whilst alive, it was known the deceased loved best, the mother, or it may be the young betrothed, who had hoped to place on her head the gay bridal crown, instead of the green laurel garland of death, advances, and calls her by her name, repeating after it the word ella (come) several times, in a tone of the most passionate entreaty; if she is mute to this appeal, if she is deaf to the voice that was dearest to her on earth, then they no longer doubt that she is dead indeed; they cover up the grave, lift their eyes to the heaven where they believe her to be,—for the Greeks do not hold the doctrine of purgatory,—and having made the sign of the cross, they depart in silence to their homes. But a year after, at the anniversary of the death, they return to the grave, and kneeling down, lay their lips to the sod, and whisper to the silent tenant, that they love her still, that she is yet remembered and regretted. ### TOUCHING INCIDENT.

A correspondent of a Methodist paper gives the following account of the conversion of Rev. Mr. Parsons, formerly an actor, now a Methodist preacher:—

Mr. Parsons was awakened unto God in this wise: While passing through this city some years since, after the recent death of one of his family, he paused over Sunday, and attended in the morning one of the Presbyterian churches. It was announced that in the afternoon the sacrament of the Lord's Supper would be administered; Christians were invited to partake of it, and others to witness the solemnities. He was suffering under anguish of spirit, and resorted to the temple again in the afternoon, as the most appropriate place for his relief. The assembly was not large, as there was no sermon; he was the only one present in the pews on the left side of the church. As he sat there in comparative solitude, his thoughts were painfully active; the devout pressed to the altar, but he was left behind; the inquiry pressed upon him, whether he should at last be separated from them, and cast off on the left hand of the Judge of the quick and dead; he went away an awakened man, and afterwards, being converted to God, entered the Methodist ministry. He preached last Sunday in that very church, and at the conclusion of the sermon related the fact as of a third person; but when he pointed to the pew where he had sat; referred to the pastor in the pulpit as the one who ministered that day at the altar, and himself as the young man awakened, the sensation in the audience was thrilling; there was an instantaneous outburst of feeling and tears, and the good pastor, who had never heard of the circumstance before, rose and expressed his emotions.

LABORS OF CALVIN.

Dr. Hoyle, who wrote under the patronage of Archbishop Usher, mentioning Calvin, says, "What shall I speak of his indefatigable industry, almost beyond the power of nature? which, paralleled with our loitering, will, I fear, exceed all credit! It may be the truest object of admiration, how one lean, worn, spent, and wearied body, could hold out. He read, every week of the year through, three divinity lectures; every other week, over and above, he preached every day; so that, (as Erasmus said of Chrysostom,) I know not whether more to admire his constancy, or theirs that heard him. Some have reckoned his yearly lectures to be one hundred and eighty-six, and his yearly sermons two hundred and eighty-six. Every Thursday he sat in the presbytery. Every Friday, when the ministers met to consult upon difficult texts, he made as good as a lecture. Besides all this, there was scarcely a day that exercised him not in answering, either by word of mouth or writing, the doubts and questions of different churches and pastors; so that he might say with Paul, 'The care of all the churches lieth upon me.' Scarcely a year passed wherein, over and above all these employments, some great volume, in folio, or other size, came not forth."

This celebrated man, even in his dying illness, would not refrain from his labors; but, when his friends endeavored to persuade him to ease himself, he replied, "What! shall my Lord come and find me idle?" [Religious Anec.

PRACTICAL PREACHING.

The simpler the period, and the less sophisticated the people, the plainer and more practical the preacher is. A gentleman visiting a clergyman in a primitive and remote part of Somersetshire, when accompanying him to church and seeing the rustic character of the congregation, said, "I can't conceive what kind of a sermon you would preach to these people, unless you tell them that if they steal their neighbor's potatoes they'll be damned!" In the more remote part of the principality, the Welsh parsons may be still heard framing their Sunday discourses on the week-day work and business of their auditors, and lecturing them upon back-biting, tale-bearing, light weights, and short measures, with a familiarity and a force, too, that show them well acquainted with the every-day life and labors of their neighbors. Maillard, who was an old Cordelier, had the same fashion; and in a sermon which the author before referred to has drawn out from its deep hiding place, he says of the apothecaries, "They mix ginger with cinnamon, which they sell for real spices; they put their bags of ginger, pepper, saffron, cinnamon, and other drugs in damp cellars, that they may weigh heavier; they mix oil with saffron, that they may give it color, and to make it weightier."

FINE ADVICE TO WESLEY BY HIS MOTHER.—And now, in good earnest, resolve to make religion the business of your life; for, after all, that is the one thing, that, strictly speaking, is necessary. All things beside are comparatively little to the purposes of life. I heartily wish you would now enter upon a strict examination of yourself, that you may know whether you have a reasonable hope of salvation by Jesus Christ. If you have, the satisfaction of knowing it will abundantly reward your pains; if you have not, you will find a more reasonable occasion for tears than can be met with in a tragedy.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, August 17, 1848.

A NEW SABBATIC ARGUMENT.

It is amusing to see with what eagerness the advocates of the first day of the week seize upon and appropriate every expression of the Scriptures, or of their own learned writers, which can by any possibility be so construed as to favor the observance of what they presume to call "the Christian Sabbath." To this eagerness, no doubt, in part, may be attributed the fact that different individuals so often advocate the observance of the first day on such conflicting grounds, and that even the same individual not unfrequently presents arguments for it which are directly at war with each other, if not with the conclusion which he would sustain. A very good illustration of this has recently come under our eye, which is attracting sufficient notice to justify a remark or two. It seems that Dr. Wardlaw, of Glasgow, Scotland, has published a treatise on the Sabbath, in which "he gives such an interpretation to Hebrews 4: 9, 10—(which speaks of the rest remaining for the people of God)—as to make it an express assertion, that the law of the Sabbath is binding on Christians." A writer for the New England Puritan, seeing a notice of this treatise in an English paper, was induced to reëxamine the passage, which has resulted in the wonderful discovery, as he thinks, that there is "much evidence of the correctness" of Dr. Wardlaw's view—so much evidence, indeed, that he ventures to head his article, announcing the discovery, "An express Christian Warrant for the Christian Sabbath." In our desire for information upon this subject, we have waded through his "exegesis" and "paraphrase," but must confess that we have not been able to find in it any new light. It has only afforded us another proof that "drowning men catch at straws," and that what may appear very clear to those who are determined to see it, may be in fact about as clear as—fog.

The writer in question commences his argument, as others have done before him, by supposing Christ to be the person referred to in the words, "He that is entered into his rest;" whereas the reference is not to Christ, but to the people of God, as may easily be seen by connecting the passage with what precedes it, "There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God; for he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works;" just as the Scripture saith, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, . . . that they may rest from their labors." However, overlooking this, together with the fact that the whole context is an exhortation to believers to labor to enter into a rest which was promised, but which there was danger of their failing to attain, he goes on to complete his argument thus: "As when God finished his work of creation, the day of his resting was sanctified as a sabbatism, or day of commemorative rest and religious exercise; so when Christ finished his work of new creation and rested from it in his resurrection, that day of his rest was in all coming time to be sanctified as a day of holy rest and commemoration." Here it will be perceived, that the writer takes for granted two disputed points, which, though not very important in their bearing upon the Sabbath question, are all-important to his argument. In the first place, he assumes that the resurrection occurred on the first day of the week, concerning which there is at least room for a doubt. All that is known about the matter is, that when the disciples came to the sepulchre "in the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week," Christ was risen and gone. The exact time of his resurrection is nowhere stated; and there are those who suppose that he rose, not on the first day of the week, but about the close of the Sabbath day—a supposition in which they are encouraged and supported from considering the fact that he was crucified and buried in the afternoon, in connection with his own assertion that he would be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. But suppose we grant, for the sake of argument, that the writer's assumption in this case is well-grounded, how shall we dispose of his second assumption, viz., that "Christ finished his work of new creation and rested from it in his resurrection?" There are some who think that Christ's work was finished when he died upon the cross—an opinion in which they are certainly countenanced by his own solemn words, uttered at that memorable period, "It is finished." There are others who suppose that Christ's work could not properly be regarded as finished, until he had ascended to heaven, and taken his seat at the right hand of the Father, which did not take place until some forty days after the resurrection. There are others still who think that the work of new creation is not yet finished, and will not be until the day of grace closes, and all the ransomed are brought home to glory. These suggestions are sufficient to show, that there is room at least for a doubt whether the work of Christ was really completed on the first day of the week. In view of them, does it not appear rather presumptuous for a man to assume that Christ completed his work by rising on the first day, and then, on the strength of that assumption, to insist upon a general observance of the first day, and justify a neglect of the seventh-day, which the Bible declares to be "the Sabbath of the Lord thy God?"

There is one feature of this argument for a change of the Sabbath from the rest that remains for the people of God, which is too often overlooked, namely, that it applies only to believers. The language of the chapter in which the allusion is found is addressed exclusively to those who 'have believed,' and who 'have a great High-Priest that is passed into the heavens.' If the argument from it could be sustained, its application would of course be limited to the persons to whom it is addressed—to believers. But unbelievers need a Sabbath as well as believers—perhaps more, since they would not be so likely to seek times of rest independent of all commands. What shall be done with them? Shall they continue to keep the day set apart by God to commemorate his creative work, in which all mankind are equally interested, while believers keep a day to commemorate Christ's redemption work, in which they are peculiarly interested? That would not do, because it would disturb the peace of society more than it is now disturbed by those who conscientiously keep the seventh day. We know not what to do with them. It devolves upon those who present this argument, to show how it consists with God's commandments and man's relations. Until they do so, we think neither the church nor the world will be much indebted to them for their discovery.

THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY—NO. 5.

MENTAL TRAINING.

Next to those spiritual and innate qualifications which we have already noticed, and without which we cannot see how any man can properly be considered as called of God to the work of the Christian ministry, we consider mental training of high importance—a necessary preparation, without which talents of sterling worth, piety of undoubted sincerity, and zeal of burning ardor, have signally failed in fields of Christian labor full of promise to the skillful laborer. Persons who doubt the necessity of this mental training, forget the manner in which the holy Scriptures have associated the subject with the requisites of the office. In Old Testament times, it was said, "The priests' lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth; for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts." If this was requisite for the priesthood under the law, a great part of whose duties was the orderly and official performance of sacred rites, how much more so is it for the Christian ministry, the chief duties of which are instruction in righteousness, exhortation, and doctrine! So the Apostle Paul, who was a happy exemplification of this sort of qualifications, exhorts that a person to be inducted into this office should not be a novice; and he exhorts Timothy, a young man already in the office, to "give attendance to reading," to "meditate," to "study." Indeed, the principle is so much in accordance with the whole spirit of the Bible, that we may apply the words of Solomon to this subject with emphasis, "Whoso loveth instruction, loveth knowledge."

It is not so important where mental training is given—whether in a public institution, under private tuition, or acquired by self-instruction—as that it should be obtained. Public institutions usually afford facilities for the object that are rarely enjoyed in private tuition; and a qualified tutor can always afford assistance that may save a great amount of labor unavoidably attending self-tuition. It is by mere matters of expediency and economy that we should choose where to obtain our mental training for public life. But let it be attained some where, as early in life as can be. Manhood is never complete in public life without it. It should be protracted and extended, as far as opportunities will permit, according to the powers of the candidate, and the sphere intended to be occupied. Some students have more diversified powers than others; such may properly take a wider range of studies, with a fair prospect of a profitable return from the labor bestowed. Some are adapted to spheres of larger responsibility than others, and need more extended qualifications to fill them. Self-knowledge, and the counsel of experienced, judicious friends, is profitable to direct in this matter.

Mental training is requisite to give all the faculties their due expansion and development. Reason, judgment and memory may be in much native strength in the mind, as power, flexibility and agility in the body; but without training their exercise will be capricious and uncertain. Whatever may be the native powers of a mechanic, his skill and ingenuity are acquired, and acquired only by discipline and application. It is so with the man of strong mind; in order to the attainment of eminence, in other words, of skill and address, or ability, his faculties must be disciplined by use to a ready compliance with the will. This is the purpose in the study of mathematics, logic, mental philosophy, and in some respects of languages. A man may forget, amidst the multifarious labors of professional life, a great part of the particulars he learned while studying these sciences, and yet never lose the benefit derived from the study of them; just as a mechanic, who changes his occupation, may forget the particular operations of the art he first learned, and yet retain all the skill and ingenuity he brought with him to the occupation he now pursues. It is a mistake to suppose that our children are not benefited by their education, because they forget in after life the stories of their Juvenile Readers, or the rules of their grammars and arithmetics. Of course the more they retain of them the better; but the mental processes which gave expansion to their minds, and development to their powers of thought, conferred a lasting benefit, which no after time can obliterate. It is as enduring as the faculties themselves. This is the case with all well-directed studies; and in no case is it more available than in the office of the Christian ministry. An educated man always brings more skill to his argument, and address to the object of his labors, than one of two-fold his native powers, who has had none of the advantages of education. The process itself does not make men more honest or truthful; nor does it make them more dishonest or erroneous; but it makes them more subtle and skillful in defense of the principles to which they are attached. Honest-hearted Christians often overlook this distinction; and when they see error and falsehood defended by learning, and upheld with great intellectual power, they turn away with disgust, and say, "Give me simplicity and truth, and let the world have its learning." Their choice in such a case is just and wise, but their inference is altogether wrong. The advocates of error adhere to it not on account of their learning or talent, but on account of their prepossessions and interests; these, learning and talent enable them to defend against ignorant and unskillful advocates of truth. The proper inference from these cases is, that the advocates of truth must buckle on their armor, and discipline themselves for the conflict, with as much or more diligence than their opponents. The defense of truth is always easier than the support of error, all other things being equal. It is not learning or intellectual power that has made error so rampant, and obscured the claims of truth, but unsanctified wealth, and governmental power and patronage. These have seized upon learning, and pressed it into their service—bribed intellect, and employed it for their own advantage. But now, in the providence of God, the intrenchments of error are broken, the friends of truth have a fairer field, and their ministry should be educated that they may take advantage of the crisis.

Mental training is requisite to the formation of habits of industrious application. Perseverance in manual labor is irksome to an undisciplined hand. What can he accomplish in the business of life, who labors only while labor is easy and grateful to the flesh? Who will employ a hand who abandons his work as soon as he feels pain or fatigue? Give us the men who never flinch until their task is accomplished! But where will you find them?—among untutored savages, or amid the disciplined hands of civilized life? It is so with the labors of professional life; it is so in the Christian ministry. No profession needs more vigor, perseverance, and patience, than does this. None presents more of the real emergencies of life, to summon all the powers to obedience at the calls of duty. None at times presents tasks more irksome and difficult in the faithful prosecution of the interests committed to its charge. And it is doubtful if any presents more temptations to listlessness and gossiping, than the Christian ministry. Hence the exhortation of Paul the Apostle to Timothy, to 'be diligent, to endure afflictions, to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.' We want thinking men men, habituated to study, men who arrange their discourses under the influence of secret devotion, under the eye of infinite purity and truth, before they catch the excitement of the pulpit; men, too, who are so accustomed to think, that they shall always be ready to defend the truths they hold in every emergency; men who shall not bend and tremble with imbecility before strong opposers. This can only be had at the expense of being trained and habituated to close thinking and reasoning. Butterfly hunters, and parlor dandies, are not the men for the defense of truth against the power of the world. Of all men, the Christian minister needs mental training to habituate him to the study of books, of men, and of principles, and spiritual things, that in the discharge of his multifarious duties he may be instant in season and out of season.

Mental training is requisite to the acquirement of such an amount and variety of knowledge, as shall fit him for all the relations of his distinguished calling. The moral character of many a transaction, and likewise of its author, turns upon the intricacies of life, so that some acquaintance with most branches of human interest is very requisite to a just judgment of men and things. All nature is laid under contribution by the sacred writers, for the illustration of divine truth; and the student of revelation must necessarily be a student of nature and history, in order to be a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of God. Indeed, it would be difficult to say where we should put limits to the profitable acquirement of knowledge suitable to the office of the Christian ministry. It is to be from his own stores of information, and knowledge of nature and revelation, that he is to furnish constant supplies for the entertainment and improvement of his auditory. We say, then, let the ministry be educated; let them have time and opportunity to acquire habits of study; let them acquire knowledge, and the art of imparting it with facility to others.

Premium Treatises.—It is stated that some person, whose name is kept a secret, has offered the grand prize of £5,000 to the students of the Scottish Universities, for the best essay on Natural Theology. It is not impossible that another set of Bridgewater Treatises will be the result.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

Since the publication of the decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, affirming the constitutionality of the Sunday Laws of that State, we have looked with considerable interest for the opinions of the press upon the subject. To our surprise, there is very little disposition, even on the part of the most strenuous coercionists, to triumph in view of this decision. The grounds upon which it is given are such as they cannot approve without invalidating their own former teachings. Hence they are for the most part content to announce the decision, and there drop the subject. The secular papers generally have simply stated the case, and given the views expressed by Judge Bell, that the law is merely a civil regulation, and is not designed to treat the Sunday as a religious day. There are some editors of religious papers, however, who foresee the evil consequences that may result from carrying out the principle upon which this decision is based, and who have expressed their dissent from it. The editor of the Christian Chronicle, the Pennsylvania Baptist paper, is among the number. After quoting largely from Judge Bell's Opinion, and giving Judge Coulter's remarks in full, he says:—

"Here we have two of our able Jurists directly at issue. Judge Coulter takes the ground that the State has a right to compel the observance of the first day of the week, because it is the Lord's day, the Christian Sabbath. He assumes that Christianity is part of the common law of the land, and from this assumption argues the constitutionality of the law that binds men to observe this day as a religious institution.

"We do not know what is generally meant when it is said that Christianity is part of the common law of the land. It is a very indefinite expression, which may mean much, or may mean little. It is a very convenient nose of wax, that may be shaped, and twisted, and pointed at the will of any one who can lay his digits upon it. Does it mean that the State is thereby obligated to see that all men obey the laws which emanate from the founder of Christianity? If so, they surely, among these, find baptism and the Lord's Supper standing prominent. Shall the State compel the observance of these? And shall it decide who are proper subjects, and what is the proper mode of baptism? Shall it settle the long-mooted communion question, and tell who shall and who shall not be admitted to the Lord's Table? If it is not allowed to intermeddle with these things, which are so prominent in the scheme of Christianity, where are the limits in which it shall be confined? Before we admit the truth of the proposition, that Christianity is part and parcel of the common law, we should like to know what the proposition means. We can then receive it, if we see the evidence of its truth; or if we attack it, we can fight, not as one that beateth the air.

"We cannot but be suspicious of every attempt on the part of the State to legislate on religious matters. We know that all ecclesiastical history bears testimony to the fact that the civil power is a sad bungler when it attempts to settle theological questions. It also bears witness to the fact, that its erroneous decisions have too often been made the ground of sore persecutions, in which Baptists have sadly suffered. The question on which the Seventh-day Baptists differ from other denominations, is an open question. We regard them as occupying a Jewish stand-point, and contending for a Jewish law. But they regard the Sabbath law as part and parcel of Christianity. We do not doubt that many of them are conscientious in their belief. By what right shall the State step in to settle this mooted point? We doubt not that they can claim authority to legislate on the subject of Christian ordinances, on precisely the same grounds.

"The position of Judge Coulter has met the approbation of some of the members of other denominations. We doubt whether there are many of our denomination who will be ready to adopt his principles. We have learned, by sad experience, to dread the encroachments of civil power in the domain of conscience. It, too often, has led to acts of violence. And the Baptists know that, in other countries, as also in this, the violent dealings of the civil authorities too often have come down on their pates. From principle, and from interest, too, we are jealous of the interference of the magistrate in religious matters."

Here is another extract, of the same general import, from a Universalist paper, the Christian Messenger, published in the city of New York. After stating the case, and quoting that article of the Constitution of Pennsylvania which guaranties freedom of conscience, and no preference of one sect over another, the editor says:—

"We do not see how it was possible for Judge Bell to give the decision he did, when he had the above article before him. This says, that no preference shall be given to any religious establishment, and yet he condemns the Seventh-day Baptists. It says also, that all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship according to the dictates of their own consciences; but the Judge virtually refuses that right to the Seventh-day Baptists, in compelling them to keep the first day of the week. We love the Sabbath, and we believe it to be a divine institution, but we wish to see no law compelling people to keep it. If men commit nuisances, let them be punished; for every man should be protected in his rights. We would allow no man to disturb a religious congregation on Sunday, or any other day; and we believe that he who worships on the seventh day has the same right to protection as he who worships on the first.

"By all such decisions, the Sabbath is injured; they are designed, we doubt not, for a good end, but as they rest the observance of the Sabbath upon a false basis, and bring to its aid unwarrantable measures, they do it a serious injury. We can depend only upon the power of truth, and the majesty of public opinion, for a proper observance of the Sabbath."

The Difference.—It is said that one murder makes a villain, while many murders make a hero. We were reminded of this by reading a paragraph from a New Orleans paper, stating that Lieutenants Hare and Dutton, who had been condemned to death, but pardoned, for burglary and murder in Mexico, had been turned out of a hotel in that city, as soon as it was known who they were, and that the captains of the steamboats had refused them a passage up the river; so that these unhappy men are neither to be allowed to live in New Orleans, nor yet to escape from it! Take this circumstance in connection with the great doings in the Crescent city at various times when officers and soldiers of the Mexican army have passed through there, and one might wonder what makes so great a difference. We suppose, however, that most persons see a difference between a little murder and robbery on individual account, and the wholesale butchery and robbery which has been committed on Uncle Sam's account. Hence they applaud the Legislature of Louisiana for presenting a magnificent sword to Gen. Scott, and the people for trying to make a President of Gen. Taylor, while they approve the course of those self-righteous hotel-keepers and steamboat captains who would not entertain or transport the pardoned men.

Methodist Church and Temperance.—One of the important measures, says an exchange, adopted by the late General Conference of the Methodist Church at Pittsburg, was the restoration of Mr. Wesley's Rule on Temperance. Wesley's Rule prohibits "drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity." The article says nothing about the manufacture of spirituous liquors, but it was considered that "selling" them applied to the manufacturer. It is supposed that in some sections of that Church the restoration of the Rule will be of no little practical value.

Swearing School-Teachers.—The question has been raised by a town Superintendant of Common Schools in this State, whether habitual profanity should be regarded as a disqualification in persons presenting themselves as candidates for school-teachers. In answer to this question, Christopher Morgan, State Superintendant, in a letter dated at the Secretary of State's office, Albany, July 21, 1848, says:—

"Among the qualifications required for a school-teacher, a good moral character is not the least important. He may be a proficient scholar, and may possess an undoubted ability to impart instruction with success, but if his instruction is immoral in its tendency it is worse than ignorance.

"Profanity is not less a violation of morality than falsehood, drunkenness, or theft. It begets a recklessness of thought and action—a moral vacuum, where every vice may find a sure receptacle; and in tender youth a person entrusted with their character, their prospects, and their usefulness, it should not and cannot be allowed.

"Your refusal to grant certificates to teachers who are addicted to habitual profanity is, therefore, in strict accordance with the rules of this department, and meets my approbation."

---

Position of the Adventists.—The following resolution, passed by one of the Advent Conferences, and published in the Advent Herald, will answer the question which is often asked as to the present views and expectations of this class of persons:—

"Whereas, God, in his mercy to a lost world, has given a revelation of his will, and in that revelation has made known the history of the world to the latest period of time; and

"Whereas, in his word he has indicated to us the approach of the end of man's probationary state, by well-known prophetic sketches of the political and moral history of the world, and by certain chronological periods, which, according to the testimony of history, and the opinions of the most competent religious writers, have been well-nigh fulfilled; and also by signs in the physical world, many of which have evidently come to pass; therefore

"Resolved, That we see no reason showing that we have taken an unauthorized position, in looking as we have for the Son of God from heaven, to raise the dead, to judge the world, and to accomplish the promised restitution of all things which God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.

New Way to get rid of Grasshoppers.—The editor of the Montreal Courier, in his paper of June 27, gives the following information, which may interest our readers:—

During a drive on Friday, below the Church of Long Point, we met a cavalcade of sixteen caleches, and inquiring the cause of such a number being together, we learned, to our surprise, that the occupants were farmers from the parish of L'Assumption. Their fields being ravaged by an innumerable army of grasshoppers, on application to their cure, or priest, they were recommended to come to town and have masses said in the Church here, (which is specially dedicated to the worship of the Virgin Mary,) for the destruction of the insects; and they were so far on their way to repeat aves and pay for masses.

The Free-Soil Convention, which met at Buffalo last week, nominated Martin Van Buren for President, and Charles Francis Adams (son of John Quincy) for Vice President. Resolutions were passed by the Convention against Slavery in the Territories, against an increase of Slave States, against Slavery in the District of Columbia, in favor of freedom of the public lands to actual settlers, cheap postage, and the election of public officers under the General Government by the people in all practical cases.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

In Congress, last week, the General Appropriation Bills were passed. The clause in the civil and diplomatic Bill to pay for the Amistad negroes was stricken out. A bill was passed to cut down the army to something like the old peace standard. The Post Office Bill occupied a good deal of time, in which the proposition to let newspapers go free for a circuit of thirty miles, and another to let them go free in the State where printed, were discussed and lost. A bill was finally passed, providing for the establishment of certain post-routes in Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, Florida, Iowa, Wisconsin, and elsewhere, and it provides that newspapers and other printed matter shall be charged one cent per ounce; the newspapers to be charged at this rate where they exceed a given number of square inches.

The great topic of the week was the Bill to organize a territorial government in Oregon. The House of Representatives passed a Bill which excluded slavery, and sent it to the Senate, where an amendment was added, giving as a reason for the exclusion, "inasmuch as the said territory is north of the parallel of 36° and 30′ of north latitude, usually known as the Missouri Compromise." This amendment the House refused to concur in, by a vote of 121 to 82, which is regarded as a very strong free-soil vote, and indicating an improvement in the feeling of the House upon that subject.

On Monday, 14th, the Senate took up the Oregon Bill again, and passed it with the Wilmot Proviso of freedom, and without any reference to the Missouri Compromise. After which Congress finally adjourned.

FOREIGH NEWS—SEVEN DAYS LATER.

On Sunday last, the steamship Acadia arrived at Boston from Liverpool, whence she sailed on the 29th ult.

The state of things in Ireland is the principal topic of discussion in the foreign papers. There can be no doubt that that country is on the eve of an insurrection, if it has not already broken out. An Act has passed Parliament, and received the Royal assent, by which the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland is empowered to apprehend, and detain until the first of March, 1849, such persons as he shall suspect against the Queen and Government. This Act is to be enforced to the fullest extent; arrests had already commenced, and officers were in pursuit of the principal agitators. Even in England arrests are being made. Meanwhile English troops are pouring into Ireland, special constables are being sworn in by thousand, and every thing is preparing for a sanguinary struggle. According to the European Times, the confederates have declared their unequivocal purpose first to capture and kill the 40,000 troops stationed in Ireland, and then establish a red Republic. Sir Charles Napier, with the fleet under his command, consisting of five large ships-of-war and many smaller vessels, has arrived at Cork. Vast military preparations are being made in Dublin, Westford, Cork, Clonmel, Tipperary, and the most dangerous parts of the country, in order to suppress any attempt at an outbreak; but from the tone of our latest intelligence, says the European Times of the 29th, we are not altogether without hopes that the leaders being silenced, the whole scheme of an insurrectionary movement will be abandoned as altogether impracticable. A later edition of the Times says that proclamations have been issued, offering rewards as follows: Smith O'Brien £500, ($2,420;) Meagher, Dillon, Doheny, £300 each, ($1,452.) It is now said, that Messrs. O'Brien, Meagher, Dillon, O'Gormon, and Lane, are beyond Garrick-on-Suir, in the County of Tipperary, surrounded by the armed peasantry, and determined to fight for their liberty.

In France all is tranquil, and the parties are gradually falling into their natural order. The principal cause of uneasiness is said now to be the affairs of Italy, and the return of Gen. Oudinot to the remnant of the army of the Alps.

From the Danube Principalities no farther authentic intelligence has been received of the progress of the Russian armies. After the expulsion of Prince Bibesco, the Provisional Government passed decrees for the abolition of punishment by death, the establishment of the liberty of the press, the organization of a National Guard, a loan of the markets of the people to the State, and the abolition of all ranks and titles.

In Italy the war is carried on with variable success. The Austrians have entered Ferrara, levied considerable supplies, and then again withdrew from the city. By the most recent accounts from the Royal Camp, all communications between Mantua, Verona, and Legnago are completely interrupted. The Duke of Genoa, with 25,000 men, invests Verona on both sides of the Adige, in the positions near Rivoli. The Duke of Savory is on the other side of Dacastello, to prevent the egress of the Austrians on that side. Continual skirmishes take place, but none of a character to decide the fate of Italy.

A party of Spaniards had rebelled against and murdered their officers at Valladolid, and proceeded to join the Montemolinists.

The King of Naples was made cognizant of the election of the Duke of Genoa to the throne of Sicily, and commenced preparations on an extensive scale for the invasion of that Island. It was calculated that the forces available for the invasion would be about 20,000 in Calabria, about 5,000 in the Fortress of Messina, and 6 or 8,000 in Naples. It was expected that the embarkation would take place about the 20th, and would land at Syracuse.

A Yankee Feat.—Charles Ellett, Jr., the architect of the Niagara Falls Suspension Bridge, thus describes his first passage over the foot-bridge:—

"This morning I laid the last plank of my foot-bridge on the Canada side, and then drove over and back again in a buggy. Five hundred feet of the bridge was without railing on either side. My horse, though spirited, went along quietly; touched up occasionally with the whip, just to show him that he was in command, and give him courage.

"On returning, I directed one of the drivers to bring on his team—a two-horse closed carriage, weighing altogether over a ton and a half. I took his place on the box, and drove over and back. The horses went quietly. The flooring is but eight feet wide, 220 feet high, 720 feet long, and, without praising, over such a torrent as you never saw, and never will see any where else!"

Ellett must be a brave man. It was a fearful scene to behold him driving a horse and wagon along a narrow bridge, with but two feet to spare on either side, and the boiling river two hundred feet below. In point of cool and quiet daring, we do not recollect of a single feat on record to equal this. [Scientific Amer.

Extraordinary Explosion.—An explosion took place on board the schooner Maria Thomas, at New Orleans, on the 31st ult., while discharging a cargo of Government stores, among which was a quantity of fixed ammunition.

In handling one of the boxes, says the Picayune, which contained bomb-shells, one of the shells, which were each placed in separate compartments of the box, became loose and exploded. This set the schooner on fire, and the flames extended to the other boxes containing shells which lay around, causing a continual roar, and succession of explosions. Two men who were working in the hold of the schooner, were severely injured—one of them mortally, it is supposed. After about a quarter of an hour, the grand explosion took place, which tore away the sides and bottom of the schooner, when the wreck sunk.

The Beauties of Smoking.—A remarkable and serious accident occurred near the Yellow Springs, in Chester Co., on the 30th ult. A gentleman named William Miller, of Natmeal township, was driving a horse and vehicle, and was accompanied by two ladies, at the same time smoking a cigar. A spark from the cigar caught the dress of one of the ladies, and before it was observed, the fire had made such progress in the combustible substance that she could not extinguish it. The vehicle was stopped, the lady leaped from the carriage, and the other, in rushing to her assistance, also had the flames communicated to her dress. Both females were now in a blaze, and being clad in thin cotton apparel, had nearly their whole clothing destroyed, and their persons burned in a shocking manner. To complete this calamity, the vehicle took fire and was burned up.

Mexican Boys.—In our walk yesterday, says the Pittsburg Gazette, we fell in company with two Mexican boys, accompanied with one of the returned volunteers. We felt a concern for the unfortunate lads, so far removed from their native land, and desired to converse with them, but they could speak very little English. We asked the volunteer who accompanied them how he came by them, and who had them in care; he said one of them was his, and the other belonged to one of the officers. He said that hundreds of small boys were to be found roving about the country, in Mexico, apparently without parents, and that any number could be had for the trouble of bringing them away. The poor little fellows appeared in fine spirits, and seemed proud that they had a protector.

Men who want Farms.—A few days since, says the N. Y. Sun, a wealthy German emigrant, named Herr Rodenberger, arrived in this city with his family of eleven persons. For over 20 years he was a burgomaster in Rhenshiem, but being compromised in some of the revolutionary movements, he was obliged to fly for safety. A large portion of his wealth remains in Germany, but he brings with him over $25,000 in specie, which is to be expended in purchasing lands for a farm. Enjoying a high character in Germany, he has been empowered to purchase lands for about 100 families who intend emigrating during the season. He left this city for Albany, though his destination is Zanesville, Ohio.

Retaliatory Foreign Postage.—In consequence of a disagreement between the Postmaster-General and the British Post Office, the people now suffer from extortionary postage. Formerly, on a half-ounce letter from New York to Great Britain, there was paid, at New York, 1 cent, and on a newspaper the same; at Liverpool, 24 cents was paid for the letter, and 4 cents for the newspaper; making the whole postage 25 cents for a letter, and 5 cents for a newspaper. Now, 24 cents is charged on this side for a letter, and four cents for a paper; making the postage of a letter 48 cents, and of a newspaper 8 cents to Liverpool. Adding the inland postage of 5 or 10 cents in the United States, the postage is manifestly oppressive, and all this is the result of a little want of conciliation between the functionaries of the two countries.

A negro man named Sam Humphrey, the property of Miss Herberts, was tried before the County Court of Alexandria for burglary, and, being convicted, was sentenced to be hung on the 29th ult. There are only seventy offences for which the penalty is death, if committed by a slave, in Virginia.

Mr. Coxwell, an English æronaut, has made a perilous ascent at Brussels. He had the alternative of allowing the gas to escape from the balloon after it had been inflated for his first voyage, or of ascending during a fierce gale; he chose the latter, and, with a friend, was hurried fifty-five miles in twenty minutes. The descent was safely made, though with difficulty.

SUMMARY.

A gentleman living in Chicago, recently left New York on Monday at six o'clock P. M., and arrived home on the following Friday at four P. M., making the trip in four days. The distance by the route traveled is nearly twelve hundred miles; and when the T rail is laid from Buffalo to Albany, and the central railroad is completed, the trip will be shortened at least 36 hours.

A daughter of Hon. S. O. Peyton, member of Congress from Kentucky, eloped a short time since with a young man to whom she was subsequently married. Upon the return of the parties home, an uncle of the bride upbraided the groom for his conduct; when, becoming enraged, the latter drew a pistol and shot him. The wounded man died in a few moments after.

A new bank is about to be established at Essex, Conn. Capital $75,000, with liberty to increase it to $150,000. The bill-holders are to have the first lien on all the property. If the debts of the bank exceed 50 per cent. of the capital and deposits at the time of its failure, (if it should fail,) then the officers of the Bank are made personally liable.

Gen. Shields, under the connivance of the General Government is is said, is hatching a scheme for annexing all the territory between the Rio Grande and the Sierra Madre to the United States. Recruits to supply the military force necessary are advertised for in New Orleans, under the pretence of a "Buffalo hunt on the Rio Grande."

Counterfeit two-dollar notes of the Oneida Bank, well calculated to deceive, both in the engraving and the signatures of the officers of the Bank, are in circulation at Buffalo. There is a wide difference, however, in the vignette, &c. The word "Oneida," in large print on the genuine note, is over the vignette; in the counterfeit it is under it. The dies at the top of the plate in the genuine notes are XX; in the counterfeit they are figures 20.

By the arrival of the brig Aurora at Baltimore, August 7, news was received from Pernambuco to the 28th of July. At that date a serious conflict had taken place between the Portuguese and Brazilians. Many of the former were killed, the stores were all closed, and a general suspension of business for a time was the result, the streets being crowded with the military. Worse results were apprehended.

The bottom of an ancient vessel, supposed to have been under water many centuries, was dug out of the mud off the American wharf, Southampton, England, a short time ago. It is supposed to be of Danish build, is about 60 feet long by the keel, very sharp, with a great rake at the bow, all close timber, and the outside timber from three to four inches thick. There are no signs of any iron-work found about her. It appears that she had but one mast, which stood in the middle. Her timbers and plank were perfectly sound.

An American Eagle has been presented to M. Vattemare, in aid of his system of international exchanges, by William Feeney, Esq., a native of Ireland, residing in Washington. It was captured on the Potomac, near Mount Vernon, about forty years ago, and is now nearly half a century old. In 1824, it presided on the triumphal arch under which Lafayette passed, and on the Fourth of July last participated in the ceremonies of laying the foundation of the Washington Monument.

The York Road Extension of the London and South-western Railway, England, was opened recently. The construction of the line has been most expensive, the two miles of railway having cost no less than a million and a half of money. It has occupied about two years and a half in its construction. This Railway extension may be deemed to surpass any other in the world for expense of construction. It appears almost incredible that such a sum could be expended on two miles of railroad.

The Cleveland Plaindealer says that while the steamboat Ohio was stopping at that port, on her last downward trip, a woman with a child fell overboard. The chambermaid of the boat jumped into the water and rescued the child, while the mother was helped out by the passengers.

The Cincinnati Gazette states that William Howitt, and his accomplished wife, Mary Howitt, contemplate leaving England, and taking up their residence in the West. They have had relatives in Ohio many years. His connection with some London Magazines has involved him in bankruptcy at the age of 54.

Four very wealthy Norwegians passed through New York city on the 7th ult. The Sun says: 'They were the proprietors of a village near Bergen. They intend to found a colony in Wisconsin, and have brought with them 160 persons, whose passages they pay The specie brought by these proprietors is immense, and their people are all in comfortable circumstances, every emigrant having from eight hundred to a thousand pounds of baggage.'

A correspondent of the Traveler states that the tuition charged at the new scientific school in Harvard University, established by the munificence of Abbott Lawrence, is so high as to exclude from its advantages all but the sons of the rich. For instruction in chemistry alone, for a term of twenty weeks, the price is $50, and the same for every other branch of study. In addition to this, the student must pay his room-rent, board, text-books, fuel, &c.; making the whole expenses for a year some $250.

Mr. Emerson Goddard, of Petersham, Mass., has invented a new spoke machine, which will turn with tennon 20 spokes in a minute. It is self-feeding and self-piling, leaving them when turned in a regular pile under one side of the machine, opposite to the feeding side. Lasts and fork handles can be turned in it with nearly the same facility as spokes.

The Charlestown (Va.) Free Press announces the death of an old patriarch, John Packett, Esq., near Smithfield, in that county, aged about ninety-five years. For many years of his life, Mr. Packett was an inmate of Washington's family, and enjoyed the regard and confidence of that great man in an eminent degree.

A flagrant insult was offered to a worthy elephant at Pittsburg, a few days since; a fellow held out a lighted cigar to one of the elephants of the menagerie! The animal acknowledged his politeness by a wipe over the ribs, which sent him half way across the arena. As big a beast as the elephant was, he was ashamed to smoke in public.

THE FLOATING STRAW.

BY CHARLES MACKAY.

The wild waves are my nightly pillows,
Beneath me roll th' Atlantic billows;
And as I rest on my couch of brine,
I watch the eternal planets shine,
Ever I ride
On a harmless tide,
Fearing naught—enjoying all things—
Undisturbed by great or small things.

Alas! for the lordly vessel
That sails so gallantly,
The winds may dash it,
The storms may wash it,
The lightnings rend its tall masts three;
But neither the wind, nor the rain, nor the sea,
Can injure me—can injure me;
The lightnings cannot strike me down,
Whirlwinds wreck, or whirlpools drown;
And the ship to be lost ere the break of morn,
May pass o'er my head in saucy scorn;
And when the night unveils its face,
I may float unharmed, in my usual place,
And the ship may show to the pitying stars
No remnant but her broken spars.

Among the shells
In the ocean dells
The ships, the crews, and the captains lie,
But the floating straw looks up to the sky.
And the humble and contented man,
Unknown to fortune escapes her ban,
And rides secure when breakers leap,
And mighty ships go down to the deep.

May pleasant breezes waft them home
That plough with their keels the driving foam,
Heaven be their hope, and Truth their law—
There needs no prayer for the floating straw.

A DOMESTIC SKETCH.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

It is the duty of mothers to sustain the reverses of fortune. Frequent and sudden as they have been in our own country, it is important that young females should possess some employment by which they might obtain a livelihood, in case they should be reduced to the necessity of supporting themselves. When families are unexpectedly reduced from affluence to poverty, how pitifully contemptible it is to see the mother desponding or helpless, and permitting her daughters to embarrass those whom it is their duty to assist and cheer.

"I have lost my whole fortune," said a merchant, as he returned one evening to his home; "we can no longer keep our carriage. We must leave this large house. The children can no longer go to expensive schools. Yesterday I was a rich man; to-day there is nothing I can call my own."

"Dear husband," said the wife, "we are still rich in each other and our children. Money may pass away, but God has given us a better treasure in those active hands and loving hearts."

"Dear father," said the children, "do not look so sober. We will help you to get a living."

"What can you do, poor things?" said he.

"You shall see, you shall see," answered several cheerful voices. "It is a pity if we have been to school for nothing. How can the father of eight children be poor. We shall work, and make you rich again."

"I shall help," said the youngest girl, hardly four years old. "I will not have any new things bought, and I shall sell my great doll."

The heart of the husband and father, which had sunk within his bosom like a stone, was lifted up. The sweet enthusiasm of the scene cheered him, and his nightly prayer was like a song of praise.

They left this stately house. The servants were dismissed. Pictures and plate, rich carpet and furniture, were sold, and she who had been so long the mistress of the mansion, shed no tear. "Pay every debt," said she, "let no one suffer through us, and we may yet be happy."

He rented a neat cottage and a small piece of ground a few miles from the city. With the aid of his sons, he cultivated vegetables for the market. He viewed with delight and astonishment the economy of his wife, nurtured as she had been in wealth, and the efficiency which his daughters soon acquired under her training.

The eldest one assisted her in the work of the household, and also instructed the younger children. Besides, they executed various works, which they had learned as accomplishments, but which they found could be disposed of to advantage. They embroidered with taste some of the ornamental parts of female apparel, which were readily sold to a merchant in the city.

They cultivated flowers, and sent bouquets to market in the cart that conveyed the vegetables; they platted straw, they painted maps, they executed plain needle-work. Every one was at her post, busy and cheerful. The cottage was like a bee-hive.

"I never enjoyed such health before," said the father.

"And I never was so happy before," said the mother.

"We never knew how many things we could do, when we lived in the great house," said the children, "and we love each other a great deal better here. You call us your little bees."

"Yes," replied the father, "and you make just such honey as the heart likes to feed on."

Economy, as well as industry, was strictly observed, nothing was wasted. Nothing unnecessary was purchased. The eldest daughter became assistant teacher in a distinguished female seminary, and the second took her place as instructress to the family.

The little dwelling, which had always been kept neat, they were soon able to beautify. Its construction was improved, and the vines and flower trees were replanted around it. The merchant was happier under his woodbine covered porch in a summer's evening, than he had been in his showy dressing-room.

"We are now thriving and prosperous," said he, "shall we return to the city?"

"Oh, no, no," was the unanimous reply.

"Let us remain," said the wife, "where we have found health and contentment."

"Father," said the youngest, "all we children hope you are not going to be rich again; for then," she added, "we little ones were shut up in the nursery, and did not see much of you or mother. Now we all live together, and sister, who loves us, teaches us, and we learn to be industrious and useful. We were none of us so happy when were rich and did not work. So, father, please not be a rich man any more."

Money Wasted.—A curious calculation was mentioned in the House of Representatives the other day. The expenses of the war with Mexico and the purchase of worthless territory, will be a hundred and seventy millions of dollars. This amount in silver, placed in two horse wagons, a thousand pounds to each wagon, would fill ten thousand six hundred and twenty-five wagons, which would make a dense train extending sixty-six miles; money enough to educate all the children of the country, and liquidate all the State debts, and clean out every harbor, and chequer the United States with railroads and canals. And then there would have been enough left to purchase all the territory which we have already acquired.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.

The Duke of Wellington is now seventy-seven years of age, about five feet eight inches high, of very prominent features, hooked nose, the eyes sunk deep into the head, but even now as bright as those of a youth. His forehead is moderately high, with snow-white hair on his head, quite thick. He stoops slightly in the shoulders, and wears a remarkably small hat upon his head. The Duke, during the summer months, rises at five o'clock, and goes out walking in the parks, returning to breakfast at eight o'clock. He lives most frugally, and devotes the day until half-past four to public business. His attendance at the 'Horse Guards'—the office of the Commander-in-Chief—is always the first of any. No appointment takes place without the Duke's investigation, and no influence can ever prevail against his conviction of right. The 'Iron Duke' may be seen riding down to his office on horseback every morning, and returning every afternoon, dressed in a blue frock coat, light colored vest, and white drill pants. He sits on a horse by no means gracefully; one shoulder is turned back, and the coat half off it. When the old General is saluted—as he is by every person who passes him—he just raises his finger to his hat, and nods his head.

The Duke of Wellington's income amounts to £110,000 ($550,000.) He has three magnificent residences, one at the corner of Hyde Park in London; Walmer Castle, on the sea coast, near Dover, and Strathsfieldsaye, about 45 miles from London. The Waterloo gallery in the London residence, is a magnificent apartment, about twenty-five feet high, forty feet wide, and eighty long. At the end of this chamber is the magnificent gold plate presented to the Duke by the allied sovereigns. When the Waterloo dinner is given, the Duke's military companions dine off this gold service. It has been stated that the gold, jewels, and other rare articles possessed by the Duke, are of the value of $3,000,000! When this extraordinary man speaks in the House of Lords, every one becomes strictly attentive; he aims at no pretence of eloquence—his sentences are a collection of aphorisms, the result of a mind that thoroughly weighs the subject in all its bearings, and gives out only the results of his cogitations. His influence is immense upon all parties, and he is never replied to but with the extremest deference.

A LONDON PRINTING OFFICE IN THE MORNING.

By 8 o'clock the whole body have arrived. Many in their costume resemble common laborers, others are better clad, several are very well dressed, but all bear in their countenances the appearance of men of considerable intelligence and education. They have scarcely assumed their respective stations, when blue mugs, each containing a pint or half a pint of tea or coffee, and attended either by a smoking hot roll stuffed with yellow butter, or by a couple of slices of bread and butter, enter the hall. The little girls, who with well-combed hair and clean shining faces bring these refreshments, carry them to those who have not breakfasted at home. Before the empty mugs have vanished, a boy enters the hall at a fast walk with a large bundle under his arm—of morning newspapers; this intellectual luxury the compositors, by a friendly subscription, allow themselves to enjoy. From their connection with the different presses, they manage to obtain the very earliest copies, and thus the news of the day is known to them—the leading articles of the different papers are criticised, applauded, or condemded—an hour or two before the great statesmen of the country have received the observations, castigations, or the intelligence they contain. One would think that compositors would be as sick of reading as a grocer's boy is of treacle; but that this is not the case, is proved by the fact that they not only willingly pay for these newspapers, but often indemnify one of their own community for giving up his work in order to sit in the middle of the hall on a high stool, and read the news aloud to them while they are laboring at their work; they will, moreover, even pay him to read to them any new book which they consider to contain any interesting information! It of course requires very great command of the mind to be able to give attention to what is read from one book, while men are intently employed in the creation of another. The apprentices and inferior workmen cannot attempt to do this, but the greater number, astonishing as it may sound, can listen without injury to their avocation. Very shortly after 8 o'clock, the whole body are at their work, at which it may be observed they patiently continue, with only an hour's interval, until 8 o'clock at night. [Quarterly Review.

The Chinese Language.—The Chinese language consists of more than 50,000 different characters. Six or seven thousand of them must be learned before the missionary can intelligibly converse in it.

In addition to the great number and variety of characters, many of them have several different significations. The character Shing, for example, pronounced with a particular intonation or inflection, signifies I. Pronounced with a different intonation, it means goose. This character has two other significations, distinguished in a similar manner. Thus all of those inflections and intonations, by which we express emotion, are in the Chinese used in giving different significations to the same character. Hence the reason there are no orators in China. The Chinese language is deficient in power to express the emotion of a soul that feels deeply the truth that is uttered.

Each word in the Chinese is a monosyllable. Words or characters are sometimes united, but the combination is still a monosyllable; and what is still more singular, the compound character has a signification that is totally different from the component parts. Take, for illustration, the character signifying horse. This is united to another character signifying mouth. Both, when united, form a monosyllable which signifies virtue.

DONKEY-RIDING IN CAIRO.

I like donkey-riding in Cairo. I never tried it out of Egypt, except for a few miles in Palestine; but I do not suppose it is the same thing anywhere else. The creatures are full of activity, and their amble is a pleasant pace in the streets.

The little rogues of donkey boys were always ready and eager, close by the hotel—hustling each other to get the preference—one displaying his English with "God save the Queen ros bif;" another smiling amiably in one's face; and others kicking and cuffing, as people who have a prior right, and must relieve us of encroachers. Then off we went briskly through the Ezbekeeyeh, under the acacias, past the water-carriers, with their full skins on their left shoulders, and the left hand holding the orifice of the neck, from which they could squirt water into the road, or quietly fill a jar at pleasure; past the silent smoking party, with their long chibouques or serpentine nargelehs; past the barber, shaving the head of a man kneeling and resting his crown on the barber's lap; past the veiled woman, with her tray of bread, thin, round cakes; past the red and white striped mosque, where we looked up for the gallery of the minaret, in hope of the muezzin coming out to call the men to prayer; past a handsome house or two, with its rich lattices, its elaborate gateway, and its shade of trees in front, or of shrubs within the court, of which we might obtain a tempting glimpse; past Shepherd's Hotel, where English gentlemen might be seen going in and out, or chatting before the door; past a row of artizan dwellings, where the joiner, the weaver, and the maker of slippers were at work, with their original tools, and in their graceful oriental postures; and then into the bazaars.

NOTES OF DOVES.

We have already noticed the plaintive notes of doves. These are not, however, the sounds of lamentation, but those of tenderness and love.

The cooing of the Zenaida dove is said to be peculiarly touching, so that one who hears it for the first time, naturally stops to ask—"What bird is that?" Its effect on the feelings is illustrated by an anecdote respecting a pirate, who was associated with a band of the most desperate villains that ever annoyed the Florida coast. This man had frequent occasion to repair to certain wells near which the doves nestled, and their soft and melancholy cry was the means of awaking in his breast feelings that had long slumbered, and of melting his heart to repentance. He was accustomed to linger at the spot, and to contrast his guilty and wretched life with former days of comparative innocence and peace. He said that he never left the wells without increased fears and misgivings respecting futurity, and at last he became so deeply moved by these notes, the only soothing sounds he ever heard during his life of horrors, that he poured out his soul in supplications for mercy, and firmly resolved to abandon his desperate companions and mode of life, and to return to his own family, who were deploring his absence. His escape from his vessel was accompanied by many difficulties and dangers, but no danger seemed to him comparable with that of living in the violation of human and divine laws. At last he reached his former home, and settled in peace among his friends.

FOES OF THE RATTLESNAKE.

The rattlesnake finds a superior foe in the deer and blacksnake. Whenever a buck discovers a rattlesnake in a situation which invites attack, he loses no time in preparing for battle. He makes up to within ten or twelve feet of the snake—then leaps forward and aims to sever the body of the snake with his sharp bifurcated hoofs. The first onset is commonly successful, but if otherwise, the buck repeats the trial until he cuts the snake in twain. The rapidity and fatality of his skillful manœuver leaves but slight chance for his victim either to escape or eject his poison into his more alert antagonist. The blacksnake is also more than an equal competitor against the rattlesnake. When the black and rattlesnake are about to meet for battle, the former darts forward at the height of his speed, and strikes at the neck of the rattlesnake with unerring certainty, leaving a foot or two of his body at liberty. In an instant he encircles him within five or six folds, and then stops and looks the strangled and gasping foe in the face, to ascertain the effect produced upon his corseted body. If he shows signs of life, the coils are multiplied, and the screws tightened—the operator all the while narrowly watching the countenance of the helpless victim. Thus the two remain thirty or forty minutes—the executioner then slackens one coil, noticing at the same time whether any signs of life appear; if so, the coil is resumed, and retained, until the wretch is completely dead. The moccasin snake is destroyed in the same way.

California.—A correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, writing from Monterey, April 19, says:—

"The rains which are now over have been abundant, and we shall have a plentiful harvest. The large emigration which is expected, will find provisions cheap. We have here almost as many emigrants from the States. They go there first, but bring up here. This is a much finer climate. I doubt if there is a climate in the world that can rival it in equability, softness, and salubrity.

"It is Holy Week here, and all the grog-shops and places of amusement have been closed till Saturday. This is an old custom, and not a bad one, especially so far as the liquor is concerned. It were better in this particular, if Holy Week continued the year round. Whatever the whites may do, no one here is permitted to sell liquor to an Indian. The penalty is $100 and six months' imprisonment. It is a salutary law, and productive of immense good to the aborigines.

"I like many traits in the Californians; they are the most respectful and polite people in the world. They are but little read—but are now sending their children to our schools. The rising generation will have more intelligence, but not more true amiability than their parents. They have ten times as much respect for law as emigrants, and are quite as honest in their dealings. The women, in habits of industry, surpass the men. A California woman would live and flourish where one of our females would despond and starve."

A Smart Dog.—A shepherd once, to prove the quickness of his dog, who was lying before the fire in the house where we were talking, said to me in the middle of a sentence concerning something else—"I'm thinking, sir, the cow is in the potatoes." Though he purposely laid no stress on these words, and said them in a quiet, unconcerned tone of voice, the dog, who appeared to be asleep, immediately jumped up, and leaping through the open window, scrambled up the turf roof of the house, from which he could see the potatoe field. He then (not seeing the cow there) ran and looked into the barn where she was, and finding that all was right, came back to the house. After a short time the shepherd said the same words again, and the dog repeated his look out; but on the false alarm being a third time given, the dog got up, and wagging his tail, looked his master in the face with so comical an expression of interrogation, that he could not help laughing aloud at him, on which, with a slight growl, he laid himself down in his warm corner with an offended air, and as if determined not to be made a fool of again.

A Glimpse of Ireland.—"Seeing a hole in the wall, and a hat upon the other side, I crept through, and found a widow sitting in the corner, with a pig on the skirt of her dress, asleep, and three little children besides. Seeing no bed, table, or cupboard, but a niche in the wall, in which were a couple of plates, I asked her where she slept. 'Here, ma'am,' pointing to a pile of straw by her side. She said she had a bed, but no place to put it. 'I wish I had something to give you to eat, but I have not a bit of bread, nor a potato.' 'I wish I had something to give you,' I answered, 'for I see no way how you can live.'

This was a fair specimen of all the mountaineers around the residence of O'Connell. But when I inquired the price of ground, and found that they were giving but a shilling an acre, for the same kind of mountain land I had seen elsewhere rented for twenty and twenty-four shillings, and no ejectments allowed, I wondered not so much that they were loud in their praises of him, and that I heard the voice of singing and of laughter from cabin and rock."

VARIETY.

At a meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, some time since, Professor Sewell remarked, that he had found old horses shod with a layer of leather, forming an artificial sole between the shoe and the hoof, recover from the severe affections causing injury to the hoof; such, for instance, as contractions, brittleness, sand cracks, or even disease of the foot itself, as thrushes, canker, corns, &c., and perfectly regain its original elasticity and firmness. The mode in question had been practiced by Prof. Sewell for the last thirty years.

Lady Jekyll asked William Whiston, of eccentric memory, one day at her husband's table, to resolve a difficulty which occurred to her in the Mosaic account of the creation. "Since it pleased God, sir," said she, "to create the woman out of the man, why did he form her out of the rib rather than any other part?" Whiston scratched his head and answered—"Indeed, madam, I do not know, unless it be that the rib is the most crooked part of the body." "There," said her husband, "you have it now! I hope your curiosity is satisfied."

The Lancet says that a mixture of two parts of the liquid ammonia of commerce, with one of some simple tincture, is recommended as a remedy for tooth-ache, so often uncontrollable. A piece of lint is dipped into this mixture, and then introduced into the carious tooth, when the nerve is entirely cauterized, and the pain stopped. It is supposed to act by neutralizing an acid product in the decaying tooth.

No man knows what he can do until he is fully resolved to do whatever he can. When men have thought themselves obligated to set about any business in good earnest, they have done that which their indolence made them suppose impossible. There are several abilities unknown to the possessor, which lie hid in the mind, for want of an occasion to call them forth.

In the course of a conversation in the House of Commons, the curious fact was elicited, that the streets of London had increased upon the aggregate length of no less than 200 miles between 1830 and 1848, or at the rate of about 12 miles of street per annum.

A Parliamentary return shows that on the 18th of March there were in the union workhouses throughout England and Wales 51,237 children, no less than 26,000 of whom were certainly illegitimate.

Pens made out of bones are now in use in England, and sold at the rate of fifty for twenty-two cents. They are pronounced to be as flexible as the quill, and far more durable.

Intemperance prevails to such an extent in England and Wales, that one hundred and sixty die daily of drunkenness. This fact is stated on the authority of a late report to Parliament.

A Yankee and an Irishman happening to be riding together passed a gallows. "Where would you be," said Jonathan, "if the gallows had its due?" "Riding alone, to be sure," said Pat.

A gentleman recently traveling near Huddersfield, called out to a boy, "Where does this road go to, my lad?" "I do not know," said the boy, "where it goes to, but it is always here when I come by."

As among wise men, he is the wisest who thinks he knows the least, so among fools, he is the greatest who thinks he knows the most.

A gentleman praising the generosity of his friend, observed that "he spent money like water." "Then, of course, he liquidated his debts," rejoined a wag.

In English not more than a dozen words end in a; about two dozen end in o. In y we have no less than 4900, about one eighth of our whole language, our words amounting to 35,000.

Probably there are no two words which more distinctly point out cause and consequence than these—gin and bitters.

St. John has furnished during the present season £15,000 worth of salmon for the Boston and New York markets.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

BOARD OF INSTRTCTION.

W. C. KENYON, A. M., } Principals.
IRA SAYLES, A. M., }

Assisted by nine able and experienced Teachers, five in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past ten years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to also continue to merit a share of public patronage.

Extensive buildings are now erected for the accommodation of students, and for Recitation and Lecture Rooms, &c. They occupy an eligible position, and are finished in the best style of modern architecture; and the different apartments are heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical

Ladies and Gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board and rooms can also be had in private families, if particularly desired.

Each room for those who board in the Hall is furnished with a bed and bedding, a table, two chairs, and a pail.

The plan of instruction adopted in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the student, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The Health, the Manners, and the Morals of our Students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

REGULATIONS.

1. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.
2. Punctuality in attending all regular Academic exercises will be required.
3. The use of Tobacco, for chewing or smoking, will not be allowed either in or about the Academic buildings.
4. Playing at games of chance cannot be allowed.
5. Using profane language cannot be allowed.
6. The use of any kind of intoxicating drinks cannot be allowed, unless prescribed in case of sickness, by a regular physician.
7. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, cannot be permitted.
8. Gentlemen and ladies of the Institution will not be permitted to visit the rooms of the opposite sex, except in cases of imperious necessity, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.
9. Good order must be maintained at all times, and in all the rooms and halls of the Institution, and in all the intercourse of students with each other.
10. All students are required to retire regularly at the ringing of the bell designated for that purpose, as occasion may require; and to rise at the ringing of the morning bell, also designated.
11. Any room, occupied by students, will, at all times, be subject to the visitation of the Teachers of the Institution, who are required to see that the regulations are complied with.
12. Students will be required to keep their own rooms in good order, and to pay all unnecessary damages, either of rooms or of furniture furnished with the rooms.

REGULAR ACADEMIC EXERCISES.

The regular exercises, at which all the students will be required to attend, unless specially excused, are, Chapel exercises each morning during the term; Recitations, from two to four, five days each week, from Monday morning till Friday evening. Compositions and Declamations, one-half day, once in two weeks, Literary, Scientific, and Moral Lectures by the Principals. Public Worship, once in each week, either on Saturday or Sunday, according as the students may be in the habit of keeping the Sabbath, either on the seventh or first day of the week.

GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the students will be in the hands of the Principals, and will be strictly and steadily exercised, and at the same time, strictly parental. The object of our academic government being to secure the greatest possible amount of physical, intellectual, and moral good to the students themselves, regularity and order of exercises, and good and wholesome citizens to society. No unwarrantable means will be made use of to enforce the observance of the above regulations; yet our constant endeavor will be, to make the means resorted to as effective as humun means may be.

Parents who place their children in this Institution, and all students who are sufficiently old to understand the necessity of order, cannot be too well assured that the foregoing regulations form the most essential part of the contract between them and us; and that whatever student wantonly violates them, and shows himself incorrigibly determined on pursuing his waywardness, will be expelled from the privileges of the Institution, and will not be permitted to re-enter it again, without special proof of reformation. Nor will an expelled student have any deduction made from full term charges.

Farther, parents are requested not to place money for expenses, in the hands of students who are not old enough to use money with discretion and economy. Either of the Principals, or the Book-keeper of the Institution, will act as fiscal guardian of such students without charge.

ADMISSION.

Candidates for admission as students, must present testimonials of good moral character, or be known to possess such a character, and must be willing to comply unreservedly with the foregoing regulations; and no one will be permitted to receive instructions in any class, until all academic bills, for the term in prospect, be paid or satisfactorily arranged.

ACADEMIC TERMS.

The Academic Year for 1848-9 consists of three terms, as follows:

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1848, and ending Thursday, November 23, 1848.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, December 5, 1848, and ending Thursday, March 15, 1849.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, April 3, 1849, and ending July 12, 1849.

As the plan of instruction in this Institution, laid out for each class, will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue through the term, and accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the terms.

N. B. Students who are expecting to teach during the winter or summer, will specify such intention on entering in the beginning of the fall or spring term; and, for the special accommodation of such, a day will be set apart at first, on which they can leave, if they wish; and they will not be permitted to leave on any other day, nor will any other than teachers be permitted to leave on the day specified.

Farther, it is of the utmost importance that the student be present at the day of the opening of the term, as on that and the succeeding day, the students entering are examined and classified.

It is also suggested to parents who patronize this Institution from the distance of a few miles around, that students should go home only once during the term, as every absence from classes is always attended with disadvantages to the student. This is a suggestion, and not imperative. But to meet this suggestion, the exercise of the school will close at noon on the seventh Friday in each term, and open again on the afternoon of Monday following.

EXPENSES.

THE JUDGES JUDGED—NO. 3.

NATURAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS INVADED.

The Court say, "The conclusion at which we have arrived is after much reflection." The delay to which the case has been subjected doubtless afforded time for "much reflection." Of what kind those reflections were, we have but little information, except from the Judge's published "Opinion" and the declaration of other members of the Bench. From the contradictory character of parts of the first-named document, and the widely different grounds on which the different judges of the same bench rest their decision, it is fair to infer, that this "much reflection" was had to bring about a concurrence in a decision that should suit the prevailing party, and avoid the just charge of violating the sacred rights of conscience, and the principles of religious liberty, which are inherent to all truly American institutions. But none of their flimsy pretences can hide the real design of the Court. That Judge Bell understands the intent of the Constitution just as we Sabbatarians do, is obvious from his own construction of it. Thus he says, "No man living under the protection of our institutions, can be coerced to profess any form of religious belief, or to practice any peculiar mode of worship, in preference to another. In this respect the Christian, the Jew, the Mohammedan, and the Pagan are alike entitled to protection;" to which he adds even the Infidel. To make the matter still plainer, he adds, in the language of a fellow-Judge, "The right of conscience, as understood under our organic law, is simply a right . . . . to do or forbear to do any act for conscience's sake, the doing or forbearing of which is not prejudicial to the public weal." Doubtless in this authoritative exposition we have the very jist of our organic law on the natural rights of conscience; and Judge Bell knew that the very object of the suit before him was to defend, against "the Act of Assembly," this natural right, on the constitutional declaration which seeks to foster and protect it. Every authoritative ordinance, from Constantine's on the Dominical Day, A. D. 321, to that of the Pennsylvania Legislature, A. D. 1794, rests the obligations of the law on religious considerations only, which have no force but as they apply to conscience. All the terms employed to designate the day, carry with them this religious import. This Judge Bell has admitted; and on this Judge Coulter has rested all his argument for concurring in the decision of the Court. Now it is impossible but that the Court must have known that the Jew and the Christian Sabbatarian reject, with all the solemnity of a conscientious protest, these religious reasons for the observance of Sunday, Lord's day, or the Christian Sabbath, inasmuch as they regard these pretensions as in palpable opposition to the institution and perpetuation of JEHOVAH'S holy Sabbath. "The civil regulation" of Papist cities, requiring all by-standers and passers-by to kneel at the approach of the "sacred host," is not more repugnant to the consciences of devout Presbyterians, than the Sunday law of Pennsylvania is to Sabbatarians, while it requires a seeming reverence to the Puritan Sabbath by a coerced abstinence from labor. Judge Bell's exposition of the Constitution is, that it allows all living under its protection, "to do or to forbear to do" what conscience dictates as duty. He knows that conscience dictates to them that they should reverence the seventh day of the week by a religious rest unto Jehovah, and that conscience equally dictates to them that they ought not so to rest on the first day of the week; and yet he affirms the constitutionality of the Act of Assembly which fines and imprisons these conscientious people for not honoring Sunday by such a religious rest; thus giving sanction to coercion in his decision, which he repudiates in his premises.

Judge Bell thinks to escape this gross contradiction by calling the Sunday law "a civil regulation for the government of man as a member of society." Suppose it were so; does the Constitution guarantee no natural right, but the religious considerations of conscience? The National and State Constitutions guarantee to all citizens equal civil rights, as well as religious ones! Now be it remembered, that it is allowed by all parties, that the Constitution guarantees the right of Sabbatarians religiously to observe the seventh day as a day of rest to Jehovah. By what right, then, may the State take away one day in six from a portion of its citizens, after allowing them their conscientious observances? Suppose the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania should tax all Sabbatarians one-sixth more taxes than the observers of Sunday are taxed for State purposes! Would it be constitutional? Would it not be a violation of natural right and equality? If this were so, in vain would the canting officers of the law tell us that we were protected alike with other citizens, and that it was at our own choice that we held property and followed particular trades. We should tell them that "our organic laws" make no invidious distinction between Sabbatarians and Sunday people! We would point to the national declaration, and tell them that "our organic law" said, "all men are born free and equal, with certain inalienable rights." Free from what? Every unequal yoke of all men! Equal in what? Not fortune, nor talent; but civil and religious rights. What is the Constitution for, but to protect the minority from the oppressions of the majority; the feeble from the power of the strong. Unless this is its operation, it is not worth a straw. The Supreme Court are constituted the guardians of these natural, constitutional rights; and the seventh-day people carried their case up to them to ask their protection from the Act of Assembly which invades these rights in their persons. But instead of judging them on these principles of the Constitution, the Court adroitly dodged the question, evaded the application of the acknowledged principles of the Constitution, and wantonly sacrificed the rights of "a portion of its citizens belonging to a respectable Christian sect," to surreptitiously established usages and popular clamor. Be it known to the world, that the Sabbatarians understand their own rights, and if they are wrested from them by the strong arm of power, they will not sit still to be hoodwinked while it is done. The false issues and artful evasions of the perpetrators of these outrages, shall be held up to view so long as liberty is left us to speak and write. What if Sabbatarians were to ask "a civil regulation" to compel the inhabitants of the towns and villages where they dwell to cease their labors on the seventh day with them! They could tell those who disliked it, that they were not obliged to keep Sunday; but if they choose to do so they are protected in it. In the courtly language of Judge Bell, we could say of such a civil regulation, "It says not to the Sunday man nor Christian Sabbath man, You shall desecrate the day you esteem as holy, and keep sacred to religion that which we deem to be so." Constitutionally we have as good a right to this as Sunday people have to our cessation from labor on the first day of the week! But what a murmuring I hear over the land! Hush! We ask no such thing; we ask only to be let alone. On the premises of Judge Bell, it cannot be pretended that we have ever injured the public weal. It is decided that the organic law of the land knows no more of the Christian religion than it does of the Jewish, the Mohammedan, or the Pagan. It administers nothing but "civil regulations." Is this so? We challenge the world to prove that the labor of Sabbatarians is more prejudicial to the public weal than that of Sunday folks. If any one called a seventh-day man, do act prejudicial to the public weal, let him suffer as a wrong-doer, and not as a Seventh-day Baptist or a Jew. The organic law of the land knows nothing of these distinctions; it protects all equally. The Jews and the Seventh-day Baptists have asked equal protection, at the hands of the several State Legislatures and Judiciary Benches to which they have appealed. In some instances it has been honestly awarded them. But in others they have been treated as though they were not equals in the eye of the law with those who observe the first day of the week! Questions submitted to these authorities, have been treated as though there was no organic law, but the will of the majority, and time-honored observances of partially enlightened forefathers. These are commonly the principles of bigots and persecutors. They are alike repugnant to the genius of the free institutions of our great republic, and to the letter and spirit of real Christianity; and must sooner or later be held in contempt. The abetters of them are usually thereby involved in measures that lead to results, at which, abstractly, they feel abhorrent, as we propose to show hereafter. S. D.

A DAUGHTER-IN-LAW IN CHINA.

The situation of a daughter-in-law in most Chinese families is not an enviable one. The very phraseology in regard to them is not a little remarkable. People, in speaking of a young woman lately married, instead of saying she has been married to such a person, say, she has gone to be daughter-in-law in such a family; and this is the title by which she is known as long as she remains in the family, that is, as long as the husband's parents are living. Her relation as a wife to a husband is buried in the more important relation to her husband's parents. In point of fact her duties to the parents, especially to the mother-in-law are considered paramount to all others, not excepting the affection she owes to her husband. What is not a little strange is that, in many cases, she is obliged to depend for clothing, both for herself and her children, on her own parents, and not on her husband. Situated as they are, and sometimes receiving much ill treatment from the mother-in-law, the death of the latter must often be a cause of real joy. This seems to be so well understood that the daughter-in-law is expected to cry louder, and wear deeper mourning, than any other member of the family. An instance of the treatment they sometimes receive, fell under my observation a day or two since. A respectable looking young woman, accompanied by a little girl came to my house, desiring to be received into the family as a servant, asking no compensation for her services except her food. Her husband has recently died, leaving her with one child. Her mother-in-law is a common street beggar, and is determined to sell her to a person, who desired her as a concubine. She could not submit to this, and wished to escape from the power of her mother-in-law, who has the legal disposal of her person. She seemed distressed, and has been taken in by Miss Aldersey, having put her little girl into the school. [Foreign Missionary.

WHAT MIGHT BE DONE.

BY CHARLES MACAY.

What might be done if men were wise—
What glorious deeds, my suffering brother,
Would they unite,
In love and right,
And cease their scorn of one another?

Oppression's heart might be imbued
With kindling drops of loving kindness,
And knowledge pour,
From shore to shore,
Light in the eye of mental blindness.

And Slavery, Warfare, Lies and Wrong,
All Vice and crime might die together;
All fruit and corn
To each man born,
Be free as warmth in summer weather.

The meanest wretch that ever trod,
The deepest sunk in guilt and sorrow,
Might stand erect,
In self-respect,
And share the teeming world to-morrow.

What might be done? This might be done,
And more than this, my suffering brother—
More than the tongue
E'er said or sung,
If men were wise and loved each other.

PERSECUTION OF THE QUAKERS AT BOSTON.

Rev. Charles A. Goodrich, in his history of the United States, speaking of this subject, says:

"In 1656 the Quakers making their appearance in Massachusetts, the legislature of the colony passed severe laws against them. No master of a vessel was allowed to bring any one of this sect into its jurisdiction on the penalty of £100. Other still severer penalties were inflicted upon them in 1657, such as cutting their ears, boring their tongues with a hot iron, &c. They were at length banished on the pain of death, and for refusing to go, were executed in 1659."

I find copies of various laws enacted in regard to the Quakers, in a work entitled, "An abstract of the sufferings of the people called Quakers, Printed and sold by the Assigns of F. Sowle at the Bible in George York, Lombard street, London, 1738." From which I copy the following:

"An Act made at a General Court held at Boston the 20th of October, 1658.

Whereas there is a pernicious sect (commonly called Quakers) lately risen, who, by word and writing, have published and maintained many dangerous and horrid tenets, and do take upon them to change and alter the received and laudable customs of our nation, in giving civil respect to equals, or reverence to superiors, whose actions tend to undermine the civil government, and also to destroy the order of churches, by denying all established forms of worship, and by withdrawing from orderly church fellowship, allowed and approved by all orthodox professors of the Truth, and instead thereof and in opposition thereunto, frequently meeting themselves, insinuating themselves into the minds of the simple, and such as are least affected to the order and government of church and commonwealth, whereby divers of our inhabitants have been infected, notwithstanding all former laws made upon the experience of their arrogant and bold obtrusions to disseminate their principles amongst us, prohibiting their coming into this jurisdiction, they have not been deterred from impetuous attempts to undermine our peace and hazard our ruin;

"For prevention thereof, this court doth order and enact, that any person or persons of the cursed sect of the Quakers, who is not an inhabitant of, but is found within this jurisdiction, shall be apprehended without warrant, where no magistrate is at hand, by any constable, commissioner, or selectman, and conveyed from constable to constable to the next magistrate, who shall commit the said person to close prison, there to remain (without bail) unto the next Court of Assistants where they shall have a legal trial. And being convicted to be of the sect of the Quakers, shall be sentenced to be banished upon pain of death. And that every inhabitant of this jurisdiction, being convicted to be of the aforesaid sect, either by taking up, publishing, or defending the horrid opinions of the Quakers, or stirring up mutiny, sedition, or rebellion against the government, or by taking up their absurd and destructive practices, viz. denying civil respect to equals and superiors, and withdrawing from our church order, or by adhering to or approving of any known Quaker and the tenets and practices of the Quakers, that are opposite to the orthodox received opinions of the godly, and endeavoring to disaffect others to civil government and church orders, or condemning the practices and proceedings of this Court against the Quakers, manifesting thereby their complying with those whose design is to overthrow the order established in Church and State, every such person, upon conviction before the said Court of Assistants, in the manner aforesaid, shall be committed to close prison for one month, and then, unless they choose voluntarily to depart this jurisdiction, shall give bond for their good behavior, and appear at the next Court, where continuing obstinate, and refusing to retract and reform the aforesaid opinions, they shall be sentenced to banishment upon pain of death. And any one Magistrate, upon information given him of any such person, shall cause him to be apprehended, and shall commit any such person to prison, according to his discretion, until he come to trial as aforesaid."

Who would have thought these law-makers themselves had left their own native land because they could not join with the established form of worship? [Jour. of Commerce.

CHRIST THE END OF THE LAW.

The following paragraph is from Dr. Chalmers' 78th lecture on the Romans. It explains very satisfactorily a passage of Scripture which is often perverted to support the worst of errors:—

"For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth." There is one obvious sense in which Christ is the end of the law; and that is when the law, viewed as a schoolmaster, brings us to the conclusion, as to its last lesson, that Christ is our only refuge, our only righteousness—thereby shutting us up unto the faith. But this is not the sort of end which is meant here. We should have a more precise understanding of the verse by taking the word end as equivalent to purpose—and that a purpose, too, which the law was fitted to serve, not merely after it was broken, but at the time of its original institution, and when it was first set up for the moral government of men. Now that the law has been violated, and we are the outcasts of its rightful condemnation, it is good to be schooled by it into the lesson that Christ is our only hiding place in whom there is no condemnation; and thus to make Christ the end or the final landing-place of that educational process through which we are conducted, when studying the high precepts and authority of the law, and our own immeasurable distance and deficiency therefrom. It is not thus, however, that this verse is to be understood; and for the right determination of what it signifies, we shall go back to one of the purposes for which the law was given at the time of its first ordination—a purpose to be gained, not after the breaking of it, but which would have been gained by the keeping of it. One of these purposes was to secure the moral rightness of man's character and conduct. But another of these purposes was to secure to him a legal right to eternal life. The one was the end of the law for his personal holiness. The other was the end of the law for his judicial righteousness, and this is what we hold to be precisely the 'end of the law for righteousness' in our text. Its direct and primary object was that man should be justified by his obedience thereto; but man falling short of this object or end by falling short of perfect obedience, can only now obtain it in Christ, in whom alone we have righteousness, even a part and an interest in that everlasting righteousness which He hath brought in by His obedience—which righteousness, with all its associated privileges and rewards, is unto all and upon all who believe. It is the merit of His obedience imputed unto us and made ours by faith, which forms our right or title-deed of entry into the kingdom of heaven. He is the Lord our righteousness; and in receiving Him we receive that righteousness which it was the end of the law to have secured for us had it been by us fulfilled; but which we in vain seek by the law, now that it has been broken.

A HINT TO MINISTERS.

There was a husbandman that always sowed good seed, but never had good corn. At last a neighbor came to him, and said, "I will tell you what probably may be the cause of it; it may be," said he, "you do not steep your seed?" "No, truly," replied the other, "nor did I ever hear seed must be steeped." "Yes, surely," said his neighbor, "and I will tell you how; it must be steeped in prayer." When the party heard this, he thanked him for his counsel, reformed his fault, and had as good corn as other persons.

May not this little anecdote afford a useful hint to those whose office it is to sow the seed of the divine word? Too frequently it is found that but very little good fruit is produced within the limits of their exertions. What can be the cause? Alas! the seed which they sow, although of the best quality, even of heavenly origin, is not steeped in prayer. To the want of scrupulously attending to this practice, may be traced the barrenness of our favored land. Let then the spiritual husbandman in future be more diligent in his attention to that important duty, and then may he hope to see the vineyard committed to his care abounding in all the fruits of righteousness. [Flavel's Husbandry.

IT IS A PARTING—NOT A LOSS.

Thou hast lost thy friend:—say rather, thou hast parted with him. That is properly lost which is past all recovery, which we cannot hope to see any more. It is not so with this friend whom thou mournest. He is only gone home a little before thee; thou art following him. You two shall meet in your father's house, and enjoy each other more happily than you could have done here below. How just is that charge of the blessed Apostle, that we should not mourn as men without hope, for those who sleep in Jesus. Did we think their souls vanished in air, as a heathen poet profanely expresses it; and their bodies resolved into dust, without any possibility of reparation; we might well cry out our eyes, for the utter extinction of those we loved. But if they do but sleep, they shall do well. Why are we impatient at their silent repose in the beds of death, when we are assured of their awaking to glory? [Hall.

THE PRIEST AND THE IRISH MILKMAN.

The following amusing instance of Irish wit, on the part of a Roman Catholic milkman, in foiling the attempts of a priest to make him give up the reading of the Bible, was related by Dr. Dowling of New York in an address during the anniversary week.

On reaching the milkman's humble cabin in the county of Kerry, the priest thus addressed him—"My good fellow, I am informed that you are in the habit of reading the Bible; is my information correct?" "Sure, it is true, plase your riverence, and a fine book it is too."

"But you know," said the priest, "that it is very wrong for an ignorant man like you to read the Scriptures." "Ah," replied Pat, "but you must be afther provin that same, before I consint to lave it off."

"That I will do from the book itself. Now turn to 1st Peter 2: 2. 'As new born babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby.' Now, you are only a babe, and are therefore wrong to read the Scriptures yourself. You are here told to 'desire the sincere milk of the word,' and one who understands what the 'sincere milk' is, must give it to you and tend to you."

Pat listened attentively to the priest's authoritative address, but no way at a loss, replied—"But be aisy, your riverence, while I tell you. A little time ago, when I was took ill, I got a man to milk my cows, and what do you think he did? why, instead of giving me rale milk, he chated me by puttin wather into it; and if you get my Bible, perhaps you may be afther serving me the same. No, no, I'll keep my cow and milk it myself; and then I shall get the sincere milk, and not, as I might from you, mixed with wather.

The priest thus finding himself defeated, and desirous that the mischief should spread no farther, said in a conciliatory tone—"Well, Pat, I see you are a little wiser than I thought you; and as you are not quite a babe, you may keep your Bible, but don't lend it or read it to your neighbors."

Pat, eyeing his admonitor very cunningly, but seriously, replied—"Sure enough, your riverence, while I have a cow, and can give a little milk to my poor neighbors who have none, it is my duty to do so, as a Christian; and saving your riverence, I will."

The priest, concluding that the honest milkman was rather a tough customer, gave up the argument, and walked off abashed.

RITCHIE AND THE PROFANE SWEARER.

The late Doctor Ritchie, Professor of Divinity in the University of Edinburgh, was one day preaching in Tarbolton church, where he was at that time minister, against profane swearing in common conversation, while one of his principal heritors, who was addicted to that sin, was present. This gentleman thought the sermon was designedly addressed to him, and that the eyes of the whole congregatian were fixed upon him. Though he felt indignant, he kept his place till the service was concluded, and then waited on the preacher, and asked him to dine with him, as he was quite alone. The invitation being accepted, the gentleman immediately after dinner thus addressed the minister:—"Sir, you have insulted me to-day in the church. I have been three times in church lately, and on every one of them you have been holding me up to the derision of the audience; so I tell you, sir, I shall never more enter the church of Tarbolton again, unless you give me your solemn promise, that you will abstain from such topics in future, as I am resolved I shall no more furnish you with the theme of your discourse." Mr. Ritchie heard this speech to a conclusion with calmness, and then looking him steadily in the face, thus replied: "Very well, sir, if you took to yourself what I said to-day against swearing, does not your conscience bear witness to its truth? You say you will not enter the church, till I cease to reprove your sins; if such is your determination, it is impossible you can enter it again; for which of the commandments have you not broken?" On observing his firmness, and feeling that he was wrong in attempting to make the minister of the parish compromise his duty, the gentleman held out his hand to Mr. Ritchie; a mutual explanation took place; and while the minister would abate none of his faithfulness, the heritor endeavored to overcome his evil habits. [Rel. Anec.

WALKER AND THE RECTOR.

After the late Rev. Samuel Walker, of Truro, had begun to feel the unspeakable importance of the truth as it is in Jesus, his preaching became of a different character to what it had previously been. When he urged the importance of regeneration, and devotedness to God, those who were living in a sensual and dissipated manner, or who were building their hopes of heaven on the morality of their lives, were offended. Accordingly, some of the most wealthy inhabitants of the town complained of him to the rector, and requested his dismission. The rector promised compliance with their wishes, and waited on Mr. Walker to give him notice to quit his curacy. He was received with much politeness and respect, and Mr. Walker soon took an opportunity, from some passing remark, to explain his views of the importance of the ministerial office, and the manner in which its duties ought to be performed. His sentiments and manner were such, that the rector went away without having accomplished his purpose. He endeavored the second time to effect the wishes of the people, but was again so awed by Mr. W's superiority, that he could not speak to him on the subject. Being afterwards pressed by one of the principal persons on the topic, he replied, "Do you go and dismiss him, if you can; I cannot. I feel, in his presence, as if he were a being of superior order, and am so abashed, that I am uneasy till I can retire from it."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, August 24, 1848.

CHRISTIANITY A PART OF THE COMMON LAW.

In the Recorder of July 27th was published the Philadelphia Ledger's report of Judge Coulter's remarks on the Pennsylvania case, as it is called. As there has not been much notice taken of Judge C.'s remarks, by those who have handled the subject thus far, some remarks may be acceptable and useful.

Among other things to the same effect, Judge C. is reported to have said thus: "General Christianity enters into the very frame of our civil existence; it is part of the common law of the State." General Christianity part of the common law of the State! What can this mean? When did all this come to pass? Is it true? Does this Judge know what law is? If he will make good what he has said, all will be well. But until he does so, and that by showing us the proof, we shall take the liberty to dany that the doctrine is true which is contained in the quotation we have made. Strange indeed it is, that our civil officers must fall into the common snare of their predecessors, that is, to suppose that it pertains to their duty or office to enforce the duties of any system of religion whatever. If Judge C.'s doctrine be true, then we suppose the citizens of the State are legally bound to submit to all the ordinances of Christianity which are therein set forth as obligatory upon men generally. Well, suppose I find in community men who reject Christianity; and looking over the requirements of that system, I find that faith in Christ is there demanded of every individual to whom the gospel is preached. Suppose then I prosecute the unbeliever; I present to the court the law, the general requirement of faith in Christ; I present the evidence of the infidelity of the accused; he is proved guilty; can he possibly escape being condemned? No, verily, he must be condemned; there is no escape. Can we accept the doctrine of Judge C., when such are its unavoidable results.

It will avail nothing to say, It is only general Christianity which is affirmed to be part of the common law. For if the first day of the week is the Christian Sabbath, there is no more reason to suppose that to be embraced in general Christianity than that the requirement to believe in Christ is. Indeed, keeping of the Christian Sabbath (if there be such a thing) may not as properly belong to general Christianity as faith in Christ does; for this is required of all—that, like baptism, may only become duty after faith has been exercised. However this may be, there is no requirement of Christianity which is more designed to obligate men generally than the requirement to believe in Christ. Yet there are other claims of Christianity which are equally as generally binding as this, and the pains and penalties of the law might be employed to enforce them all on the same principle upon which Judge C. would enforce abstinence from labor on the first day of the week. But should it be said, that we ought to understand Judge C. to mean that Christianity generally, or in some general sense, is part of the common law of the State, this will only make the matter worse for him still. For, with this view of the expression, the word general, used by him to qualify the Christianity, has no particular meaning whatever, and only serves to obscure the sense of the statement; and Judge C. might just as well have said, flatly and plainly, that Christianity is part of the common law of the State. Then there would have been no disguise about it, and all would have understood at once that the Church and State were united in earnest. So then, Christianity in a general sense having become a part of the common law, of course each particular part of that system, or each requirement of it, must be part of the common law, and ought to be enforced as such, for it is a rule in logic, (and which accords with common-sense,) that what may be affirmed of a whole may be affirmed of its parts. Therefore Judge Coulter's doctrine is either that the State Courts have authority to force men to obey all those demands of Christianity which are therein shown to be made upon men generally, or otherwise that said Courts have authority to force men to obey the Christian system as a whole, and consequently all its particular parts. Now, who could have believed that a Judge of any court in these United States could ever have dared to affirm any system of religion to be part of the law of the State, under any qualifying terms or any disguise whatever. This is truly amazing! What strides we take! How truly Christian the State has got to be! The Christian religion has been practiced so long universally and faithfully among us by our Courts, and they have so long enforced its various ordinances by their decisions, that it is now become part of our common law!

But no—stop; this is not so. Christianity is in no sense part of our common law. Our laws allow and (would if consistently administered) protect all religions, but they require none. Does not Judge C. know, that neither Christianity nor any other religion can be part of our common law? Does he not know, that while our fundamental laws, our constitutions, remain as they are, what he has affirmed is impossible? We suspect that Judge C., while looking at the very general regard that is paid voluntarily by our citizens to Christianity, has been led to mistake such a state of things for the right to enforce the same as by common law—a very great mistake, and one which ought not to pass uncorrected. Is it not evidently the interest that the men of the church feel and manifest in the Sunday rest, as a support to their religious organizations, which prompts our judges to decide in favor of the constitutionality of the Sunday statute, rather than any clear and well-defined reason for so doing in their own minds? What more is necessary to prove this, than to see them unitedly affirming that the statute in question is constitutional, one because the thing required by the statute is, and another because it is not, a religious duty! Were this question left to the care of the State, to decide simply in respect to the interest it has in the matter, independently of any bearings it may have in gratifying importunate religious sects, or upon the popularity of individuals or parties, men would at once no doubt enjoy their rights on this subject; that is, they would labor or rest when they pleased, and not be questioned by their fellow citizens or their rulers about it. But that will not do. The courts must be besieged; they must be made to understand that the Sunday law must be sustained—that all the interests of religion and morality will perish if it is not—that there will be no Sabbath kept by the people, and the worship of God will be abandoned, if they are allowed to act for themselves, or unless they are made to lay aside their business by the force of law—and that, should the courts not sustain the Sunday law, it would be an awful dereliction from their duty—a deplorable catastrophe, which must upheave all the sacred foundations, and dissolve all the moral and religious bonds, of society. Thus they give a most melancholy comment upon the devotedness of professed Christians, as they understand it, and also upon the notorious weakness of those evidences by which they undertake to convince men that the first day of the week is the Christian Sabbath, and that they are by the requirement of God bound to keep it. No doubt, in such a case, it is highly important that the civil authorities should do all in their power. But when they have done, how much more real morality and piety will there be in the land for all the success which may attend their efforts to force men to mimic those virtues, while in their hearts they despise both them and the tyrants who compel them to it.

And now we earnestly ask, SHALL WE NEVER UNDERSTAND THE TRUE LIMITS OF THAT AUTHORITY WHICH THE STATE HAS OVER THE CITIZEN? Why should this sea of civil authority be ceaselessly, and to all generations, breaking over its well-marked shores, engulfing the peace and rights of men beneath its wild careering and desolating waves? If what the State requires of a citizen be necessary in order that the privileges of others, as citizens, be equal to his, then the authority of the State is just at its proper limits. But if that which the State requires is not necessary for such purpose, then the authority or requirement of the State exceeds its just limits, and oppression is the result; because the only proper business of the civil government, in all its doings, is to secure to each citizen, as such, an equal share of privileges, and not to dictate any, unless they assume or attempt in some way or other to appropriate to themselves more than they can have and leave an equal share to others. Now the great majority of the citizens in this country choose to keep or rest on the first day of the week, and work upon all the other days. A few of our citizens choose to keep or rest on the seventh day of the week, and work upon all the other days. Now, if it be necessary for the State to require any thing of either of these parties, in order to equalize the privileges which they as citizens derive from the State, while pursuing their respective courses, then and for that purpose the State may and ought to interfere; but if the interference of the State is not necessary for that purpose, the moment the State requires any conformity of one of these parties to the other, it prostitutes its authority to the direct and positive destruction of that equality in respect to privileges among its citizens which is its only proper business to preserve. Each citizen has a right to follow any calling for a support which is not of itself a violation of the rights of others. And for the ends of life, liberty and happiness, he has a right to occupy, in the pursuit of his calling, not only his own private premises, but also all public roads, thoroughfares, landings, and the like which have been provided by the State, and which, in common with his fellow-citizens, the State requires him to support. The reason of this is plain; he has property in these, and as long as he so occupies them as to leave an equal opportunity to others to do the same, he has a right to use such public premises on all days of the week, month, or year. And if the State ever refuses him the privilege thus to do, he is a wronged and injured man by that very power which, in receiving his money or services for its support, has pledged itself to defend him from wrong.

But it may be urged, that should this doctrine be carried out into practice, it would result in the disturbance of worshiping congregations on the first day. We shall not allow, however, that any thing would disturb a congregation on the first day, or any one day, which would not disturb it on any other day. Now it is common for congregations, both "in the country and in cities," to worship on any day of the week. And sometimes they meet to worship for weeks and even months together, and that too while the great mass of community are busily employed in their ordinary pursuits; and it often happens, that the busy multitudes make a great deal of noise in the immediate vicinity of these worshiping assemblies. Yet, if all this is done without any signs of an intention to disturb or discommode those at worship, no complaint is heard; and indeed there is no ground for any, for all are enjoying their rights. And even should the noise in the vicinity of a house of worship amount to a preventive of the use of the building as a place of worship, and yet it were only the result of one or more citizens pursuing their common avocations in a common way, the only remedy the congregation could justly have, would be to buy out those whose business disturbed them in their worship, or appropriate their place of worship to some other purpose, and seek somewhere else a place of worship that would accommodate them better. The practical justice of this doctrine can readily be seen, by supposing that in the vicinity of a place of worship some person or persons own an establishment in which they are transacting some kind of business, say school-teaching, which they are as really prevented from carrying on when a congregation is at worship in the adjacent house of worship, as the congregation was supposed to be prevented from worshiping in the other case by the noise made by the transacting of business in their vicinity when they wished to worship—and then asking what these school-teachers can do to relieve themselves. No one would be at a loss how to answer such a question. Only one answer will be thought of, or can be given to it. These teachers may either buy the congregation out, or accommodate themselves as the congregation in the other case was obliged to, by selling out and going somewhere else. This too is as applicable to the first day as any other. What if all who are not conscientious in regard to keeping the first day, should attend to business on that day just when business should seem to require. It might then appear very proper that those who regard that day as the Sabbath should try to instruct and convince others of the correctness of their opinions. But they would have no reason to find fault, as though any body had trespassed on their rights, or to invoke the magistrate to befriend them. At all events, it would seem, since the practice of observing the first day is so nearly universal in the community, and not only the great but also the small affairs of the Nation, States, Counties, Towns, and even neighborhoods, are shaped to the custom of suspending business on that day—we say, it would seem at all events as though it ought to satisfy, in regard to their accommodation, the most craving dispositions that could be bred in a republican government—and especially those that pretend to be pious. But if, when enjoying all these advantages, they chance to descry in the distance, as it were, a small fragment or mere fraction of the people, who, from conviction of duty, take upon themselves a practice which operates almost as a prohibition against their enjoying any of the lucrative and desirable stations in society—a people who, though they may escape the vengeance of God, yet the customs of men will hardly suffer to exist—we say, if under such circumstances, the privileged class, in the exercise of an insatiate spirit of tyranny and oppression, concentrates its might, with such rapacious lust of malign and cruel power, to CRUSH such a scathed and peeled people as those who observe the seventh day are, there is something in the transaction too desperate to be put into words, or, in other words, inexpressibly desperate. For one branch of community to be allowed to keep and try to worship upon a day on which even more than an average amount of the noise and tumult of business is heard in every direction, and then to bear the odium and inconvenience of going to their work when nearly the whole population is resting around them, and the opportunities of business generally are fast closed up against them—these are too great privileges for them to enjoy, even in the most retired and obscure abodes, in which their peculiar faith and practice may have destined them to live. But for another branch of community to have the customs, arrangments, and prejudices of society in their favor, and almost universal silence to prevail on the day when they choose to rest and worship; and when they go to work to have all the doors of business thrown open to suit their inclinations of enterprise or ambition—this, all this, is too little for them to enjoy, if there are any who are too conscientious to do them reverence, or bold enough to dispute the soundness of the dogmas they advance. If there be a man who thinks he ought to go about his ordinary business on the first day, he must be forced to stop till these his republican—Christian—fellow-citizens tell him that he may proceed.

The court decided in this case, that a citizen could not claim the right to work on the first day, on the account of the fourth commandment requiring any thing of that kind. But whatever that part of the subject may involve, one thing is certain, in spite of all argument to the contrary, namely, that a man may conscientiously believe, on other and scriptural grounds, that it is imperiously his duty, to himself or to those for whom God has required him to provide, that he should work or labor at his ordinary business, whatever that may be, even on the first day of the week. Wherefore there is no real difference in the principle involved in these two cases, that is, whether the State force a man to rest on the first day of the week, or to work upon the seventh. The only difference is, that in the one case the man is forced to violate or suffer the violation of his conscience in being passive, and in the other by being active. The conscience is violated as really and as much in the one instance as in the other. And for this reason our rulers will never arrive at consistency, and complete their present course of government, on this point, and in respect to these men, until they force all who attempt to keep the seventh day to go to work on that day as other people do. We may therefore reasonably calculate, that the government will either abandon its present position, and give all their rights, or proceed to the consummation of the work in which it has engaged, and absolutely prohibit the keeping of the seventh day altogether.

SUNDAY IN CONGRESS.

A part of the Sunday before the adjournment of Congress was used by the Senate in a way which we presume most of the sticklers for a strict observance of that day would disapprove. It seems that the question before the Senate throughout the Sabbath was, whether to accept the Oregon Bill as it passed the House, with the Wilmot Proviso, and without the Missouri Compromise, or to insist upon its amendment adding the Missouri Compromise, and so defeat the Bill. The discussion was continued throughout the night following the Sabbath, and up to near ten o'clock on Sunday morning, when the vote was taken, and the Bill, as it came from the House, adopted. Here then we have the Senate of the United States in session during at least ten hours of what is by the mass of professing Christians regarded as sacred time. If Judge Coulter's notion be true, that Christianity is so much a part of the common law of this country that the magistrate ought to punish those who desecrate the "Christian Sabbath," here is business for some body to attend to. We have no fellowship for the system of petty persecution which lets the big sinners go, while it searches out and punishes the quiet and conscientious Sabbath-keepers. Only think what an example to offenders it would be, if all the members of the Senate of the United States were arraigned for desecrating the Sunday, fined four dollars each, with costs, and imprisoned for a few days in case of non-payment of the fine. Such a spectacle would show the majesty of law, the sacredness of the institution which in this case it is designed to guard, and the danger of those who dare to defy it. If we believed in hunting out men for such crimes, we should much prefer taking up a case of this kind to sneaking about in some farming district to discover and inform against the man who should happen to be found hoeing corn or drawing rails. We commend this business to some of the magistrates or informers who are accustomed to exercise themselves in such matters. Perhaps, however, it may be supposed that this was a case of necessity or mercy, and that the parties ought to be excused on this ground. But if that plea were allowed in this case, we think it might be urged in almost any case. The only score on which there seems any real justification, is that they were doing good, which is generally allowed to be lawful on the Sabbath. But even this would not suffice for all; one party was trying to do directly the opposite to the other, and the plea of doing good cannot certainly apply to both. We should be glad to see this subject unraveled by the learned.

SLAVERY NOT A BIBLE INSTITUTION.

It is a little amusing to see what arguments our southern brethren will resort to for the justification of the traffic in slaves. A correspondent of the New York Tribune, who hails from Virginia, in a communication which appeared in that paper a few days since, rather arrogantly asks permission to refer the editor to 1 Peter 2: 18, which says, "Servants be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward," and then asks the question, "Why are you so bitter against slavery, when it was not condemned by God himself, and was ordained from the beginning of the world?" Now I think the writer had overlooked Fxodus 21: 16, which says, "He that stealeth a man and selleth him, or if he be found in his hands, he shall surely be put to death." I have no doubt that servants have been common from the earliest ages, but every servant is not a slave. "Servants ye are to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey." Hence the beauty and propriety of the exhortations, Servants obey your masters; Children obey your parents; Wives submit yourselves to your husbands, &c. It is certainly a commendable virtue for servants of every grade to be obedient to their rulers, or to those placed in authority over them, while they so remain.

Some refer to Abraham for an example to justify their traffic in human flesh. We admit that Abraham had servants (not slaves) to the number of 318, and no doubt he had employment them, for "he was very rich in cattle and in gold, and his substance was very great." But from whence did he procure his servants? Not from Africa or any other nation by stealth or purchase, but they were born in his own house, and needed not the laws of Virginia to enable him to retain them, or keep them in subjection. Hagar was an exception, for she was an Egyptian; but it is very evident that she was not treated with much severity or cruelty. Fortunately we have the laws of the Hebrews that were in ferce in the days of Abraham, from which to correct misapprehensions. It appears that they had three classes of servants. One class was composed of those who were poor, and sold themselves, or were sold, to pay their debts, or delivered up by their parents in cases of necessity; but this kind of servitude could not be extended beyond the term of six years, when they might return to liberty again, and their masters could not retain them against their wills. Another class were those who had forfeited their lives by being prisoners of war; and those who held such, kept them, exchanged them, sold them, or disposed of them as their own goods; but they could not be retained beyond the next jubilee. Servant is also taken for a man who has dedicated himself to the service of another by the choice of his own will and inclination. Thus Joshua was the servant of Moses, Elisha of Elijah, and the apostles were servants of Jesus Christ. But I do not find the word slave in the whole code of Hebrew laws. The only distinctions in their domestics are servants and bond-servants; the one goes free in six years, and the other at the next year of jubilee. Perhaps another may be added, though I think an occasion of the kind has seldom if ever happened; I mean those who sign their own bond of perpetual servitude by going to the door-post and having their ears bored through with an awl by their master in the presence of the Judge.

Upon the whole, I am well satisfied, that the present system of slavery, as maintained in the southern States, never received its origin in the days of Abraham, nor from his posterity, nor from any Christian nation up to the present day; but I think more likely it originated with some of the ancient heathen nations, who knew not God, nor regarded his laws, or anticipated a day of final retribution.

Immersion of an English Rector.—According to the London Patriot, the cathedral town of Winchester, Eng., has been thrown into considerable excitement by the public immersion of the Rev. C. Proby, rector of St. Peter's, in that city. The particulars are as follows:—The Rev. J. Branch, minister of the Baptist Chapel, Waterloo road, London, attended and took part, some time ago, at a public meeting in Winchester, where Mr. Proby was present. After the meeting, a conversation took place, when Mr. Branch gave his views on the subject of baptism; he found Mr. Proby had been doubting for a long period upon the subject. On a subsequent Sunday, Mr. Branch again visited Winchester, to preach there in behalf of the Sunday-school, when he received a request from the rector of St. Peter's to baptize him, which he did accordingly, in a running brook, in the presence of between one and two hundred persons, after the rector had made a solemn and public profession of his faith. In the afternoon, the rector partook of the Lord's Supper at the Baptist Chapel, and in the evening preached a sermon at St. Peter's church, although forbidden by the churchwardens, stating what he had done, and giving his views on the subject of baptism. We understand that Mr. Proby immediately informed his diocesan of the whole matter; the result, of course, is his immediate suspension.

No Tobacco for Ministers.—There is a paper published at Covington, Ky.—"the Golden Rule"—which goes dead against the use of tobacco, treating it as a sin of the same dye with the use of intoxicating drinks. In a recent number we find a resolution passed by a Ministerial Association held in Lockland, Ohio, July 12, which we commend to the particular attention of the class of persons whom it names. Perhaps it may be interesting also to others who use the weed, for it is difficult to see how that which is "incompatible with ministerial character" can be compatible with Christian character:—

"Resolved, That the use of tobacco, in the shape of the quid, pipe, cigar, or snuff, except as a medicine, is incompatible with the ministerial character."

A Quakeress Missionary.—The Boston Post says that Susan Howland sailed on Wednesday morning in the Europa for Liverpool. She was accompanied by her husband, Joseph Howland, a wealthy, retired merchant, of New Bedford. This benevolent friend, moved with sympathy for Europeans on the continent, in their darkness, now struggling for that liberty which the gospel alone can bestow, has relinquished the comforts of home and a large circle of devoted relatives and friends, to carry the light of the divine word to France and other adjacent countries, as Providence may open the way. Their children, and numerous friends of the society, accompanied them to the Europa, in the bay, where they silently commended this devoted missionary to the protection of the Almighty, and received the parting benediction.

Public Lands free to actual Settlers.—In our notice last week of the Free Soil Convention at Buffalo, we stated that the members of it were in favor of granting public land to actual settlers without charge. Here is the resolution passed by the Convention on that subject:—

"Resolved, That the free grant to actual settlers, in consideration of the expenses they incur in making settlements in the wilderness, which are usually fully equal to their actual cost, and of the public benefits resulting therefrom, of reasonable portions of the public lands, under suitable limitations, is a wise and just measure of public policy, which will promote in various ways, the interests of all the States of this Union; and we therefore recommend it to the favorable consideration of the American People."

FOREIGN NEWS—SEVEN DAYS LATER.

The steamer Cambria arrived at New York on Sabbath last, bringing English papers to the 5th inst.

The news from Ireland is of course first in interest, but it is exceedingly unsatisfactory. All the Irish papers friendly to the insurgents have been suppressed, and the English papers doubtless give such a coloring to the facts as will be least likely to awaken sympathy in this country. From one quarter and another, however, there are reports of a conflict between the English and the Irish. Some accounts represent it as very serious and bloody; others that it was only between a small body of police and insurgents, and did not amount to much. In view of all the conflicting accounts, we are inclined to the opinion, that nothing of importance has occurred, except a baffled attempt to arrest Smith O'Brien, which was the cause of the conflict. The English troops and spies had been doing their utmost for ten days to arrest the leaders, but with only partial success—some of the editors and secondary characters having been arrested, while the principals are at large. This is regarded by many as a favorable state of things among the insurgents, who are represented as gaining strength for the contest. Another arrival must, we think, bring decisive news, either of fighting or submission.

From France, there is nothing of special interest. Ledru-Rollin, Louis Blanc, Caussidiere, and Proudhon have been inculpated in the revolts. Lamartine is not compromised in any of the outbreaks. Opinion respecting the fate of the prisoners is very much divided; some having it they will be sent to Senegal, others to Africa, and not a few asserting that some capital executions will take place of those more seriously implicated. It is generally believed Government will act with severity, and many are, therefore, absconding to escape detection. Daily arrests still take place.

From Northern Italy, we learn that there has been a long and close battle between the Aused in effecting the object he had in view, and in finally declared for Radetzky, who has succeedtrians and the Piedmontese, and victory has forcing Charles Albert to retire beyond the Mincio.

Letters from Pesth announce that the Hungarians have met with a severe defeat near Szegedin; the statements are conflicting, but it appears that, after bombarding and taking St. Thomas, they encountered a body of 15,000 Illyrians and Servians, and were completely defeated. Their commander, Count Berchtold, is said to be among the slain.

The war with Holstein is to be renewed. The Provisional Government of the Duchies has issued a proclamation declaring that the negotiations are at end, and throwing the responsibility of recommencing the war on the Danes, who, it states, desired from Gen. Wrangel dishonorable conditions, and rejected the most reasonable demands. An immediate advance of the allied army and a most formidable war may be looked for. The Danes do not yet think the Prussian General will attempt crossing the frontier.

DREADFUL FIRE IN ALBANY.

From the Albany Argus of Friday, Aug. 18.

Our city is literally desolate. A fire broke out at about noon yesterday, in a stable in the rear of the Albion Hotel, corner of Broadway and Herkimer-st., between Broadway and the river. The wind was a gale from the south, the heat of the weather and the fire intense, and every thing dry and combustible. In an inconceivably short time the fire spread over a wide surface, prostrating every thing before it. The efforts of the firemen, aided by the Troy, West Troy, Greenbush, Arsenal, and Schenectady companies, were directed as well as they could be under such appalling circumstances, but they were powerless against such an amazing force of flame, of raging wind, and the fierce heat of the wide-spreading and all-consuming element.

The fire was not arrested till after 5 in the afternoon; and only then by a providential change of the wind, which threw the current of flame back upon its vast track of devastation, followed by a heavy and drenching rain. This alone preserved to the city all the business and commercial portion of it that has escaped.

Full FOUR HUNDRED BUILDINGS are consumed, and property probably not less than TWO OR THREE MILLIONS, although no estimate of value is yet attainable. We hear of two forwarding lines that estimate property under their charge to the amount of $90,000, all consumed. Another line suffers to an amount from $60,000 to $80,000. The loss of flour afloat and in store is not less than 10,000 barrels.

The area of the fire embraces many acres, perhaps forty, of the most compact and valuable part of the city. It includes at least twenty squares. Amid the ruins which every where meet the eye, it is difficult to trace the outlines of the former state of things; but those familiar with the city will perceive the extent of this most calamitous visitation, by a few generalities.

Broadway, from the intersection of Herkimer, to the south corner of Hudson-st., on the west side, and to Van Schaack's Variety Store on the east side, nearly half a mile, is, with all its structures and stores, including the Eagle Tavern, the Townsend House, and the United States Hotel, level with the earth.

From Broadway to the river, including the ranges of lofty stores on Quay-st., throughout nearly the entire space above-mentioned, all is a heap of ruins.

All the cross streets entering Broadway, Herkimer, Bleecker, Lydius, Hamilton, Division, and Hudson, west as far as Union and Dallius-sts., are swept away. Amazing effort preserved Goold's great carriage and coach establishment; every thing on the surrounding streets being demolished.

North, the flying cinders, with which the air was filled, caught the Columbia-st. Market, and of that large structure nothing remains. The adjacent buildings were saved by the prompt efforts of the two Schenectady fire companies.

But the scene of the most striking and absolute desolation is the Pier. Scarcely a vestige of it remains. Throughout its entire length, from Hamilton-street to the cut opposite the Boston depot, it is utterly consumed, including the wharves, ware-houses, nearly all the shipping in the Basin and outside the Pier, tow-boats, barges, canal-boats, huge floating ware-house arks, with all their valuable and vast contents of goods and products, the three bridges at Columbia, State, and Hamilton streets, lumber-yards, flour stores, in short every thing that floated or teemed with life and value in that great mart yesterday morning.

The conflagration of the Pier, so utterly sweeping, was as rapid as it was unexpected. It was supposed to be safe, owing to the intervening Basin. Its only danger was from the flying cinders; and every store had its look-out and its buckets. When all danger was supposed to have passed, a spark caught under a clapboard on the east or river side of the Pier, and in a few moments the flames were beyond all control, and throughout the entire length of the Pier, such was the rush of the flames, that many of the merchants, cut off from escape from the basin side, abandoning all hope of saving property, hastily threw their books and valuable papers into boats, and put out into the river.

The scene in State-st. beggars all description. Thousands, flying from the conflagration, pressed every conceivable vehicle into their service, depositing goods, furniture, families, children, every thing animate and inanimate. Every point in that wide street—at the Exchange, at the City Bank, at the corner of all the intersecting streets, in front of St. Peter's Church, all along the Parks, and finally at the State Hall and City Hall—were crowded with bales, boxes, furniture, goods of every description, &c. No point was deemed too remote from the devouring element. The stores every where were closed, or were only opened to the flying citizens and their effects.

Later accounts say that 439 buildings were destroyed, and property to the value of about three millions of dollars. The total amount insured is said to be about five hundred and seventy thousand dollars. Several lives were lost, but the exact number is not yet ascertained.

THE WAY THE MONEY GOES.—Just before the adjournment of Congress, according to the Tribune, the members voted themselves the 'usual' allowances of books all round—about $600 worth each, we believe, to those who have not already received them. The cost to the Treasury is estimated at $120,000; and the members might with equal propriety have voted themselves a hogshead of Madeira each, and a silver goblet to drink it from. If they would only read the books there would be some excuse for this swindle; but nine-tenths of them will leave Congress as ignorant as they entered it—or will learn otherwise than by reading. They have also voted their Door-keepers, Messengers, &c., the 'usual' gouge of $250 each, in addition to the excessive pay to which the law entitles them—one effect of which is to crowd Washington at the opening of Congress with brigades of office-beggars from the very extremities of the Union. This Government is becoming unbearably corrupt and prodigal, and we see no remedy short of a National Convention to reform the Federal Constitution. Such a Convention could and would erect barriers against some of the grossest abuses now tolerated and growing.

MELANCHOLY BEREAVEMENTS.—The N. Y. Tribune, after noticing the deaths at the Emigrant Hospital, says that cases of melancholy bereavement frequently occur among the immigrants who arrive here. A Welch minister, named Hughes, called at the office yesterday and inquired for a little son. Mr. H. arrived here a few weeks since with his wife and four children. He left for Pittsburgh, the child mentioned being in the Hospital. On returning he finds that his wife and four children are all dead. His grief may readily be imagined. Not long since, a woman arrived here, in one of the long-passaged vessels, with seven children, the whole of whom were sick and were sent to the Hospital at Ward's Island, she assisting to take care of them. Her husband died during the passage. One after another, in the course of a short time, she saw her little ones pass away, till they were all gone, when she herself fell a prey to grief. Thus all perished.

ACCIDENT ON THE L. I. RAILROAD.—On Wednesday morning, Aug. 16, a pleasure excursion from Jamaica, Springfield, Roslin, Manhasset, and Hempstead, for Greenport and Sag Harbor, met with a sudden disappointment. The train of ten cars and two locomotives, with at least five hundred passengers, while under full headway, ran into a descending train, about six miles west of Greenport, injuring the cars, killing two persons, and wounding several. The passengers waited here in the hot sun, without refreshment or food, ten hours, when the train for New York came up and conveyed them back. All this was owing to an over-eager desire of the engineer to make a quick trip and reach another turn-out before stopping. It is supposed he did not see the descending train, which had halted, and whose engineer was unhappily scalded to death.

LAMENTABLE CASE.—The N. Y. Tribune says that two girls of high respectability, aged about 14 and 16 years, whose parents reside in one of the beautiful towns on the banks of the Hudson, were induced to leave their homes about six weeks ago and come to this city, where they were soon placed by their seducers in houses of ill-fame, and would probably have remained in them until they had become so degraded as to preclude all hopes of reform had not a quarrel ensued between the persons to whose charge they had respectively been committed. Prompt measures will now be taken to restore them to their afflicted parents, who recently dispatched officers in every direction in search of the deluded girls.

THE RED MAN IN CONVENTION.—In the second annual convention of the diocese (Episcopal) of Wisconsin, held on the 14th of June, among other business, a chief of the Oneida tribe of Indians, a man of considerable intelligence, was elected a lay delegate to the next general convention. The tribe was represented by four of our red brethren at this convention.

OFFICERS FOR OREGON TERRITORY.—The following officers for the new Territory of Oregon have been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, viz: Gen. Shields, Governor. Kitzinge Pritchett, of Pennsylvania, Secretary of the Territory. William P. Bryant, of Indiana, Chief Justice of the District Court. James Turney, of Illinois, and Peter H. Burnett, of Oregon, Associate Judges of the District Court. Isaac W. R. Browsley, of New York, District Attorney. Joseph L. Meek, of Oregon, United States Marshal.

INSURRECTION IN SIAM.—We see it stated in an English paper, says the Boston Transcript, that there has been a serious disturbance in Bangkok, the Capital of Siam. According to this account, an emeute occurred among the Chinese in that city, who are very numerous, and two battles were fought between the insurgents and the Siamese authorities, in the former of which 300 Chinese were killed, and in the latter 1,000. Since these contests, it is alledged that there has been an indiscriminate massacre of some 5,000 persons.

SUMMARY.

The Albany Atlas says that at the recent session of the Grand Jury, Theodore Olcott, Cashier of the late Canal Bank, was arraigned on five indictments: two for perjury in swearing to false statements of the condition of the Canal Bank, one for embezzling the funds of the Onondaga County Bank, one for embezzling the funds of the Ogdensburgh Bank, and one for obtaining money by false pretences from I. A. H. Cornell. He pleaded not guilty, and in default of $24,000, was committed to jail.

An unknown malady has made its appearance in Greene, Chenango Co. Twenty-four deaths have occurred in two weeks. A correspondent of the Albany Evening Journal says, "The subject baffles the skill of all our physicians in Binghampton, Oxford, and Norwich. It is very gloomy times here. The bells do not toll, as the effect upon the sick is bad. Several families have fled to the mountains."

The Utica and Schenectady Railroad Company, by the President, have settled with Mr. J. R. Howard, Esq., of Felt's Mills, for the death of his son, killed by a collision of the cars near Herkimer, in May last. The President of the Company proposed to pay all the incidental expenses attending the accident, including the physician's bill, coffin, sending the remains home, &c., and $2,200 beside. The offer was promptly accepted, and the money paid over to Mr. Howard.

It is stated that within the last eighteen months, not far from sixty new flouring mills have been erected in Michigan. There is an immense surplus of grain in the peninsular State, particularly in the northern part, but the erection of so many new mills will have the effect of causing a less amount from that region to reach Buffalo in the berry, than heretofore. In Macomber county alone nine mills, with forty run of stone, commence business this fall.

The Congregationalists in Massachusetts have just raised $100,000 for their College at Amherst, and within the last three months $150,000 have been donated to Harvard University, in the same State.

A nest of white swallows has been found on the premises of Capt. Pratt, near Lewiston Falls, Me. The old swallows, which are perfectly white, were seen last summer in that neighborhood. There are now three young ones in the nest, all perfectly white.

A meeting was recently held in England to found an institution for the training of nurses and the encouragement of acts of charity. The plan contemplates something like the Roman Catholic Sisters of Charity. It has called forth some distinguished men as its supporters.

The German farmers of Penn., have formally protested in many of the journals against the transit of electric telegraph wires through their lands, as injurious to life and property, and pernicious to the crops.

"I hold," says a western editor, with dignified emphasis, "I hold it, as a self-evident principle, that no man should take a newspaper three consecutive years without at least making an apology to the editor for not paying for it."

In 1785, the soil of England was owned by 240,000 proprietors; in 1815, the number had decreased to 30,000, and is still diminishing, and only one person in every 800 has any ownership in the soil. Of course pauperism is steadily on the increase.

A sad accident occurred at Williamstown, Berkshire Co., Mass., on Saturday, P. M. Aug. 12. Two fine boys, by the names of Charles Blackington and James Shermon, of eleven and nine years of age, were drowned while bathing.

A man named Nelson Sandford, aged 22, was killed Tuesday, Aug. 15, on the railroad between Schenectady and Albany, by striking his head against the turnpike bridge. Mr. Sandford's father was formerly a member of Congress, and is now an extensive carpet manufacturer at Amsterdam.

The steamer Robert Wrightman burst her boiler below Wheeling, on Monday, Aug. 14, by which one person was killed, and three others fatally scalded.

It is said that Gen. Santa Anna intends to take up his residence in Havana, because in Jamaica there is no society, no theatre, no kind of amusement.

A western Judge decided, in a case which came off a few months since, that the presentation of a daguerreotype, from a gentleman to his lady love, was equivalent to a promise of marriage.

An explosion of a weak steam pipe lately took place on board the steamboat Highland Mary, at St. Louis, Mo., by which six persons were more or less scalded.

A boy in Portsmouth, N. H., has been convicted of writing obscene words on a fence, and fined $9,68 therefor.

By an arrival at New Orleans, Wednesday, August 16, advices were received from Campeachy, Yucatan, to the 5th inst. The whites had defeated the Indians in numerous engagements, and recovered most of the lower towns.

The stopping of work at the Alleghany Factories, because of a law limiting the hours of labor, is likely to prove a serious matter. The Pittsburg Gazette of Aug. 15 says:—"It was reported yesterday, that the factories would all resume work this morning, and that a posse had been summoned to protect the proprietors in the exercise of their rights; but we learned last evening, from the Mayor of Alleghany, that all the manufacturers had convened and unanimously resolved to suspend operations until next spring, in consequence of the mobocratic demonstration made yesterday, and threatened for to-day.

Speaking of the St. Croix insurrection, the New Orleans Crescent says that of the 500 soldiers who went upon a British steamer to St. Croix, recently, from St. Johns, P. R., to put down the slave insurrection at the former place, above 100 of them were killed, and a number taken prisoners. A Provisional Government was then formed by the white inhabitants, to protect themselves from the blacks, accompanied with a protest against the decree of the Governor, freeing them after the 5th inst.

Speaking of the cost of Government, the Chronotype says that in South Carolina there were in 1844 about 340,000 slaves and 260,000 free people. As the slaves are governed personally by the free, State government has almost nothing to do with them. The expense of governing the State, that is to say, the free population, that year, was $347,000, or $1,33 to each individual. In Massachusetts, the same year, the population was about 800,000 and the expenses of State government about $461,000, or $0,57 to each individual.

According to a letter from Vera Cruz, as soon as the military officers, and those belonging to the government returned to the city of Mexico after the departure of the U. S. troops, they caused to be published a handbill with the names of all the Mexican ladies of respectability who had been visited by the American officers during the occupation, as if the receiving of them was a serious crime.

An arrival at New Orleans, Tuesday, Aug. 15, from Vera Cruz, brings advices to the 3d inst. from that port. The revolution has been suppressed throughout Mexico, the Indians disarmed, and all the prisoners discharged upon pledging themselves to support the Government. Most of the Americans who remained in Mexico have gone to Yucatan, to aid in subduing the refractory Indians of that province.

A meeting of the Newark (N. J.) Anti-Slavery Society was dispersed the other night, by a crowd of men and boys, who rushed into the room and commenced yelling, upsetting the benches, &c., and not content with this, they took the books belonging to the Society, carried them into the street and burned them.

The correspondent of a New York paper, describing the incidents of the "Four Days" in Paris, gives the following curious item: "The largest and finest battalion of Guarde Mobile I have seen during the day, was led by a full-blooded negro, tall and erect, and full of military ardor."

On the 26th ult., at New Orleans, a flatboat freighted with coal, when descending the river, was struck by lightning opposite the Bonnet-Carre, St. John the Baptist Parish, and sunk immediately, with three men on board. So sudden was the disaster, that no assistance could be rendered them.

The State of Massachusetts granted within the past year $10,000 for the establishment of agricultural schools.

Sister Sisson embraced religion when young, and connected herself with the Free-Will Baptists, and with that people continued to fill her place as a Christian until called to join the great Church above. Her last sickness was protracted about ten months, which she bore with great resignation and patience. She has left an affectionate husband and aged parents, with a number of brothers and sisters, and a large train of relatives to mourn their loss, which we trust is her gain. S. B. C.

MISSIONARY NOTICE.

To the Churches composing the Eastern Association:—

It will be remembered, that the sum of five hundred dollars was considered necessary to sustain missionary labor at Newport and Green Hill. As only about one-half that amount has been pledged, and as the Board are not permitted to involve the Association beyond its available funds, at a late session of the Board the Secretary was ordered to notify the missionaries in its employ accordingly, and also to make one more appeal to the churches to raise the amount required.

Pursuant, therefore, to such resolution, I hereby request the pastors and ministers of the several churches immediately to ascertain the amount each church will raise for this purpose, and inform me accordingly. And I am the more particular to request special attention to this, as I made a similar call some two months since, but not a solitary church has deigned to respond. Thus the Board has been under the painful necessity of informing its laborers of the probability that they could not be sustained but one-half of the present year.

Brethren, these things ought not so to be. Must these fields be vacated? Must our missionaries be recalled from their labors, and these waste places of our Zion be left without an inhabitant? God forbid.

I wish each church to forward to me a reliable pledge of the amount it will raise as soon as practicable.

In behalf of the Board, S. S. GRISWOLD, Cor. Sec.

HOPKINTON, R. I., Aug. 14, 1848.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF WAR.

BY ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Bloodsnuff, the Giant, lives sole in his den,
Breakfasting, dining, and supping on men;
Chained to his chair with a horrible gout,
He rises but seldom, and never goes out;
Yet piled is his table with roasted and raw—
Men, women, and babes come alike to his maw,
Huge platters of soldiers descend at a gulp,
Small children by spoonfuls, all smashed to a pulp—
Bright maidens by forkfuls, not dressed alamode,
But shrieking with terror, go down the same road,
Full beakers of blood stand for wine at his dinner,
And tears are the tea of the merciless sinner.

"How catch you, old Giant, your grog and your grub,
Of a race you no longer can follow or drub,
Whose ears are of lightning, whose legs are of steam,
Who fathom the sky with a tube or a dream?"

"Right easy, he! ha!" he replied with a roar,
"Right easy my larder and cellar I store
With barrel of man-meat and barrels of gore.
When I need something fresh to drive Famine away,
Calling Newsmen and Poets that serve in my pay,
'To the Kings and Presidents, go you,' I say,
'Rub the ears of their spunk, pull the tails of their pride,
That they for my household may further provide.'
They set them agoing and give them a puff,
And straightway my house has provisions enough."

STATISTICS OF THE WAR.

The whole number of Americans who were killed in the recent war, including the line of the Rio Grande and that of Vera Cruz, is estimated at 2,000, and the wounded at 4,000. It is impossible to say how many of the latter have died in consequence of their wounds, but we should suppose not less than one-fourth, say 1,000, making in all 3,000 deaths from battle.

This, however, bears but a small portion to the number who have sunk under disease. We state under the authority of several officers of rank that on the left flank of the Castle of Perote, there are 600 American graves, all victims of disease. A still larger number perished in the Capital—the deaths there for a considerable time, were one thousand monthly, and we learn that at no time did they fall below 300 to 400.

The first Mississippi regiment that went out to the Rio Grande, buried 135 on the banks of that river before it ever went into battle, and finally brought back less than one-third of their number. They suffered dreadfully at Buena Vista.

The first and second Pennsylvania regiments, recently returned, went out 1,800 strong (900 each,) brought home about 600 of the original number—about 220 fell in battle, nearly 400 died, and about 600 were discharged as unfit for duty—how many of the latter have since died is of course unknown.

The 3d and 4th Tennessee regiments, also recently returned, lost 360 by death—neither of these regiments have been in action,

Capt. Naylor, of Pennsylvania, took down a company of 104 men, he brought back seventeen! He entered the battle of Contreras with 33 men, he brought 19 out of it.

The most frightful instance of mortality, however, that we have heard of, was in that gallant corps, the Georgia Battalion, commanded by a gallant and accomplished officer, Col. Seymour. They were considered acclimated, and actually suffered much less while in the lower country, than when marched into the interior on the high land. The battalion went to Mexico 419 strong; about 220 actually died; a large number were discharged with broken-down, ruined constitutions; and many of them, no doubt, have since gone to their graves; and the battalion was reduced to thirty-four men fit for duty! On one parade, when a certain company was called, that had mustered upward of 100 men, a single private answered to the call, and wasi ts sole living representative! The captain, the three lieutenants, the four sergeants, and the four corporals, (every commissioned and non-commissioned) officer were dead!

We have heard from the officers of other regiments, details very similar to those we have given above, which may be taken as about the fair average losses for all the volunteer regiments, The regulars did not suffer to the same extent.

Such is War! such are the results over which we are called upon to rejoice!

THE NITRE LAKES IN EGYPT.

What a singular scene; in the midst of this sandy waste, where uniformity is rarely interrupted by grass or shrubs, there are entensive nitre springs rising from the earth like crytalized fruits. One thinks he sees a wild waste overgrwon with moss, weeds, and shrubs, thickly covered with hoar frost. And to image this wintry scene, beneath the fervent heat of an Egyptian sun, will give some idea of the strangeness of its aspect. The existence of this nitre upon the sandy surface is caused by the evaporation of the lakes. According to the quantity of nitre left behind do these fantastic shapes assume either a dazzling white color, or are more or less tinted with the sombre hue of the sand. The nitre lakes themselves, six in number, situated in a spacious valley, between two rows of low sand hills, present a pleasant contrast in their dark blue and red color, to the dull hues of the sand. The nitre, which forms a thick crystalized crust upon those shallow lakes, is broken off in large square plates, which are either of a dirty white, or of a flesh color, or a dark deep red. The Fellahs employed upon this labor stand quite naked in the water, furnished with iron rods. The part which is removed becoming speedily renewed, the riches of its produce are inexhaustible. It is hence that nearly the whole of Europe is exclusively supplied with nitre; and this has probably been the case for ages, for Sinard mentions, at the commencement of the last century, that then six hundred and thirty thousand weight of nitre was annually broken by the Grand Seignor, to whom it yielded thirty-six purses.

A Cure for the Asiatic Cholera.—The London Globe states that letters have been received from Dr. Andreosky, physician to the commander-in-chief of the Russian forces, stating that the mineral naptha, obtained from Beker, on the shores of the Caspian sea, given in doses of from ten to fifteen and twenty drops, repeated, if necessary, had proved a cure for Asiatic cholera, even during the most severe collapses. The naptha is of a white or rose color, and is used undistilled. It is much stronger than the ordinary naptha of commerce.

INVENTIONS AND IMPROVEMENTS.

Fire Annihilator.—The London Builder gives an account of a Fire Annihilator, which is described as a small machine of the size of a common pail, containing several iron encasements, and in the middle seven pounds of nitre, carbon, and gypsum, in the proportions of six, two, and two, and also one quart of water; at a touch of the finger on a small piston, charged with a small quantity of chlorate of potass and sugar, the compound is in a moment converted into steam to an amount so enormous, that it equals the quantity produced by a five-horse steam-boiler, and is equivalent to a brigade fire-engine. The whole machine can be made for five dollars, of which the combustible spent is worth only about three dollars and a half.

India Rubber Pavement.—The court-yard of the English Admiralty, Whitehall, has been covered with a paving of India Rubber. An experiment tried upon it resulted very satisfactorily. It is laid down in pieces about twelve inches square and one in thickness. The quadrangle at Buckingham Palace, formed by the erection of a new wing, will also be covered with this material, which its projectors have named "Kamptolite." Its chief recommendation is, that it deadens all sound, rendering the passage of a vehicle of horses perfectly noiseless.

Geological Discovery.—Not far from the right banks of the Nicolaifskaia, in the Government of Tobolsk, in Siberia, a rich mine of stones has been discovered, in the midst of the establishment for the washing of suriferous sands. These stones, says Galignani, present a perfect resemblance to diamonds, except that they are a trifle less heavy and less hard, though harder than granite. Russian mineralogists propose to call them Diamantoide.

A New Operation for Deafness.—M. Bonnafout of Paris, a military surgeon, gave an account before the British Academy of Sciences, at a recent session, of a method used by him in cases of deafness, to discover whether the nerve of sound had lost all its susceptibility. He has ascertained that the skull is a good conductor of vibration, and that if it be struck by vibrating objects, the nerve of the ear is acted upon whenever its susceptibility has not entirely been destroyed.

An Improved Faucet has been discovered, which discharges the water only so long as a small handle is pressed. On the moment of removing the hand and releasing the stop-cock, the water is immediately shut off by its own action—thus obviating the danger of overflows and damage from the carelessness of servants, who frequently leave the Croton running from the contrivances now in use.

Improvement in Carriage Springs.—Mr. E. T. Sprout, of Springfield, Pennsylvania, has invented a new improvement in the carriage, by connecting the spring and reach together—the spring forming part of the reach. They serve thus combined as braces to the hind axle-tree. The body loops are also a spring, and there is nothing but steel from the axle-tree and bolster to the body of the carriage. The motion of the carriage is thereby rendered very easy, and only about fifty pounds of common steel spring is needed for a one-horse vehicle. By this improvement carriages can be made lighter, cheaper, more suitable, and more durable. The spring used is the half eliptic. [Farmer & Mechanic.

BEAUTY OF JEWESSES.

It is related that Chateadbriand, on returning from his Eastern travels, was asked if he conld assign a reason why the women of the Jewish race were so much handsomer than the men, when he gave the following one: "Jewesses," he said, "have escaped the curse which alighted upon the fathers, husbands, and sons. Not a Jewess was to be seen among the crowd of priests and rabble who insulted the Son of God, scourging him, crowning him with thorns, and subjecting him to infamy and the agony of the cross. The women of Judea believed in the Saviour, and assisted and soothed him under affliction. A woman of Bethany poured on his head precious ointment, which she kept in a case of alabaster. The sinner anointed his feet with perfumed oil, and wiped them with her hair. Christ on his part, extended mercy to the Jewesses. He raised from the dead the son of the widow of Nain, and Martha's brother Lazarus. He cured Simon's mother-in-law, and the woman who touched the hem of his garment. To the Samaritan woman he was a spring of living water, and a compassionate judge to the women in adultery. The daughters of Jerusalem wept over him; the holy women accompanied him to Calvary, brought him spices; and weeping, sought him in the sepulchre. 'Woman, why weepest thou?' His first appearance after the resurrection was to Mary Magdalene, He said to her, 'Mary!' At the sound of his voice, Mary's eyes were opened, and she answered, 'Master.' The reflection of some beautiful ray must have rested on the brow of the Jewess."

PHILOSOPHIC COURTSHIP

Sir Isaac Newton was persuaded by one of his friends to marry; he excused himself by saying that he had no time to court a wife; his friends said they would assist by sending to his apartment a woman of worth. He thanked them for the offer, and promised to receive a visit from her. His friends applied to the woman, and requested her to dispense with the usual ceremonies of courtship, and wait on the philosopher, which she consented to do. When she came to his apartment, and produced her letter of recommendation, he received her politely, filled and fired his pipe, sat down by her side, took hold of her hand, and conversed on the subject. Before they had brought the point to a close, some questions about the magnitude of the heavenly bodies struck his mind with such force that he forgot what he was about—he turned his eyes up to heaven, took the pipe out of his mouth with his left hand, and, being lost in study, without design, took the lady's left hand, which he laid in his own, and with one of her fingers crowded the tobacco in the bowl of his pipe, and held it there so long that her heart, as well as her finger, took fire, and she in a huff sprung up and went off, leaving the philosopher to finish his study alone.

"Every misery that I miss is a new mercy," said good old Izaak Walton. How few of us in enumerating our blessings think of this.

Scorching a Horse's Nose.—They had a destructive fire in Rochsburg, Pa., a short time since, the origin of which is thus accounted for by a correspondent of the Chronotype:—

A man having a sick horse, took him into a field, and placing some dried herbs in a tin pan, tied the same very securely to the horse's under jaw, and set the herbs on fire, that the poor beast might inhale the fragrant odors of the burnt offering, and so be cured of his ailings. Unfortunately, not only the odors but the flame also ascended the horse's nostrils, which caused him to break from his owner, and in mad fury he galloped away to his stable, the door of which was open. The fire of the herbs was in an instant communicated to the dry hay, and in one hour the barn, a large and valuable Hotel, and six or seven other buildings. were level with the ground. So much for scorching a horse's nose.

Expense to incur Pain.—In Borneo, little is known of medicine, and less of surgery. While there, Captain Buxman was under the necessity of submitting to the operation of phlebotomy, and he thus describes the effect it had upon the natives:—"One day being indisposed, I ordered the surgeon to bleed me; Cay Dessonattee, a native, with several others, being in the room, and strangers to the operation, were in great amazement to know what we were about, till at length the vein being opened they saw the blood gush out. On this they were so frightened that they immediately ran out of the room, crying out, 'Oaan zela attie,' which means, 'that the man's heart and mind is foolish.' After which they told us, we let out our very souls and lives willingly. To this I replied, that their diet being mean, and their drink only water, they had no occasion for bleeding, but that we, who drink so much wine and punch, and feed upon flesh, rendering the blood hot and rich, were absolutely obliged to resort to that operation to prevent illness. Cay Dessonatte replied, 'I think that shows you are still greater fools in putting yourselves to such expensive charges on purpose to receive pain for it.'"

Impromptu Butter.—We yesterday saw sweet milk converted into butter in four minutes, probably a dash of iced-water would have brought the butter in less time. This wonderful effect was produced by one of the most simple churning machines that we have ever seen. It consists of a square box, having a hollow perpendicular shaft with two hollow arms or tubes at the lower end. The shaft rests on a pivot, and is turned by a small crank and cog wheel; the motion causes the air to rush down the tube to the milk, and produces a commotion like boiling water, the butter began to come immediately, and it was as sweet as new. By this process good churn butter can be made for breakfast by any family after the milkman has come in the morning, and the luxury of pure fresh butter enjoyed the year round. While the cakes are baking, or the muffins toasting, the head of the family may be amusing himself by churning the butter to eat with them. [Mirror.

Chinese Empire.—"The Chinese Empire," said Mr. Williams, who has long been a Missionary in that country, in a recent discourse, "was held together rather by loyalty to the Emperor than by power. The great honor paid by children to parents, he thinks, has been noticed by the special favor of heaven, in the perpetuation of the nation through such a long succession of centuries. The influence of Confucius has been beyond that of any other sage, and is as great now as at the close of the first century after ois death. The language and literature of China are the product of millions of minds for thousands of years. Prior to the year 1842, the labors of missionaiies were mainly directed, to Chinese living out of China; now the country is opened, and the gospel may be preached by the sixty-seven missionaries in the free ports in all parts of the Empire. More than five thousand Chinese now hear the gospel at fifteen different stations.

How to Endure Conversation.—When Rousseau once retired to a village, he had to learn to endure its conversation; for this purpose, he was compelled to invent an expedient to get rid of his uneasy sensations. "Alone, I have never known ennui, even when perfectly unoccupied; my mind, filling the void, was sufficient to busy me. It is only the inactive chit-chat of the room, when every one is seated face to face, and only moving their tongues, which I could never endure. There to be a fixture, nailed with one hand on the other, to settle the state of the weather, or catch the flies about one; or, what is worse, to be bandying compliments,—this, to me, is not bearable." He hit on the expedient of making lace-strings, carrying his working cushion in his visits, to keep peace with his country gossips. [D'Israeli.

Curious Mode of Making Butter.—If I want butter only for my own breakfast, I lay a sheet of blotting paper upon a plate and pour the cream upon it. In a short time the milk filters through, and the butter is formed. If I wish to expedite the operation, I turn the paper over gently upon the cream, and keep it in contact for a a few moments, and the butter is formed in less than two minutes. If you submit it to severe pressure by a screw press it becomes as hard as when frozen. I cannot think but the simplicity of this mode of proceeding would be universally adopted, if any better material than blotting paper could be thought of for the filter—the paper adhering too firmly to the butter, and the finest muslin admitting the passage of the cream. Novel Lottery.—A curious lottery came off lately in a small village of France. A very popular and handsome, but poor young man, put himself up as the one prize in a lottery of ten thousand tickets—two dollars a ticket. His advertisement was addressed particularly to widows consolable, and maids without dowers. The town of X——, and all the neighboring towns, were absorbed in this interesting game of hazard, and the tickets were all sold in a few days. At the time of drawing, a young lady who had no interest in the affair, beyond the frolic, turned out to have the prize number. The young man immediately called to offer her the winnings, and they fancied each other so violently at first sight that they were married within twenty-four hours! The lottery had, of course, produced a fortune of a hundred thousand francs, and they began the married state with a promising outfit. There remained, however, consequently, nine thousand, nine hundred, and ninety-nine dames and damsels (blank) in the village of X—— and its neighborhood, who are on the look out for a husband.

The Dead Sea Expedition.—The Dead Sea exploring party have successfully and satisfactorily completed their task, and returned to Jerusalem, where they were May 19th. They sounded the sea in its parts to the depth of 600 fathoms, and found the bottom crusted with crystalized salt. The pestilential effects attributed to the waters turn out to be fabulous. Ducks were seen swimming over the surface, and partridges abounded along the shore. The party were upon the sea in their boats, or encamped on its borders, for some two months, and their researches and estimates have been of the most thorough and interesting character. All were in excellent health and spirits, no sickness or accident have occurred. By the Arabs they had been received, and uniformly treated with the utmost kindness and attention. The Syrians consider "the men of the Jordan," as they call them, the greatest heroes of the day. Lieutenants Lynch and Dale will visit, under the most favorable circumstances, all the places made memorable in Scriptural history, and we may expect from them a highly interesting account of their exploration of the Dead Sea, and their adventures in the Holy Land.

Fruit Trees.—Instead of continuing the old practice of having alternate bearing and barren years, for fruit trees, those who cultivate them would do well to note this fact: When young trees come into bearing for the first time, about the time the fruit is setting, if the most of it is taken off and this continued for a few years in succession, leaving every year about the same quantities on the trees, they will by the time they have become of sufficient size to be profitable, acquire the habit of bearing every year.

Mr. Pell, of New York, claims to have made his apple trees bear annually, by laying the bark of the tree open with a sharp knife from the ground to the limbs, and by manure and culture.

To stop Bees from Fighting.—I am a peace man, and a teetotaler, and will make known the best use to which spirits can be applied. Put a little alcohol, or almost any kind of spirits, on the bottom boards around and under the hive of belligerant bees, and it will allay their fury like a charm. Having heard of this remedy, I was induced to try it, and found it a "fixed fact."

VARIETY.

A writer in the National Intelligencer says that spirits of hartshorn is a certain remedy for the bite of a mad dog. The wounds, he adds, should be constantly bathed with it, and three or four doses, diluted, taken inwardly through the day. The hartshorn decomposes chemically the virtue insinuated into the wound, and immediately alters and destroys its deleteriousness. The writer, who resided in Brazil for some time, first tried it for the bite of a scorpion, and found that it removed pain and inflammation instantly. Subsequently he tried it for the bite of a rattlesnake with similar success. At the suggestion of the writer, an old friend and physician in England tried it in cases of hydrophobia and always with success.

Under our office window a vault is being dug, says the Cincinnati Commercial. As it was determined to go down to the gravel, it is dug very deep. After digging through various kinds of soil, chiefly clay, at 35 feet in depth the workmen reached a stratum of blue clay, which is one of the characteristics of this region. But at 49 feet depth they reached a log of wood, of 30 inches in diameter. As this was several feet below the stratum of blue clay, it seems that this could hardly have been on the surface at any time since the memory of the white settlers. A tree, at 50 feet below the top of the soil, indicates that the whole of that depth has been made by deposits.

It is related of Charles James Fox, that when a tradesman called upon him with a bill, and found money before him, he congratulated himself that he should be paid, but was told by the gambling statesman that the whole was bespoken by debts of honor. "Then," said the tradesman, throwing the securities into the fire, "I'll make mine a debt of honor." "I thank you for your confidence," was Fox's reply, "and here is your money."

If milk be introduced into bottles, then well-corked, put into a pan of cold water, and gradually raised to the boiling point, and after being allowed to cool, be taken out and set away in a cool place, the milk may be preserved perfectly sweet for upwards of half a year. Or it may be evaporated to dryness by a gentle heat and under constant stirring. A dry mass will, when dissolved in water possess all the qualities of the best milk.

No living, sleeping, or working room should contain less than 140 superficial feet at the bottom, nor should be less than eight feet high, with at least one window, opening at the top, and if possible it should not be without an open fire-place, or an opening for ventilation near the door.

A beautiful writer says, that children may teach us one enviable art—the art of being happy. Free from artificial wants, unsated by indulgence, all nature ministers to the boy's pleasure. He can carve out felicity from a bit of hard twig, or fish for it successfully in a puddle.

Trees and vines which are kept the cleanest bear the best: like the human body the pores of their skin become clogged with dirt and retains gasses which should escape. Trees, the bark of which has been scraped and rubbed become more thriving and more vigorous.

An Irish orator, speaking of an opponents love of praise, described him as so vain in that respect, "that he would be content to give up the ghost, if it were but to read the stone-cutter's puff on his grave."

"How," said Mr. Munsel to Mr. Yates, "do you accomplish so much in so short a time? Have you any particular plan?" "I have. When I have any particular thing to do, I go and do it."

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

BOARD OF INSTRTCTION.

W. C. KENYON, A. M., } Principals.
IRA SAYLES, A. M., }

Assisted by nine able and experienced Teachers, five in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past ten years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to also continue to merit a share of public patronage

Extensive buildings are now erected for the accommodation of students, and for Recitation and Lecture Rooms, &c. They occupy an eligible position, and are finished in the best style of modern architecture; and the different apartments are heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical

Ladies and Gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board and rooms can also be had in private families, if particularly desired.

Each room for those who board in the Hall is furnished with a bed and bedding, a table, two chairs, and a pail.

The plan of instruction adopted in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the student, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The Health, the Manners, and the Morals of our Students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

REGULATIONS.

1. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.
2. Punctuality in attending all regular Academic exercises will be required.
3. The use of Tobacco, for chewing or smoking, will not be allowed either in or about the Academic buildings.
4. Playing at games of chance cannot be allowed.
5. Using profane language cannot be allowed.
6. The use of any kind of intoxicating drinks cannot be allowed, unless prescribed in case of sickness, by a regular physician.
7. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, cannot be permitted.
8. Gentlemen and ladies of the Institution will not be permitted to visit the rooms of the opposite sex, except in cases of imperious necessity, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.
9. Good order must be maintained at all times, and in all the rooms and halls of the Institution, and in all the intercourse of students with each other.
10. All students are required to retire regularly at the ringing of the bell designated for that purpose, as occasion may require; and to rise at the ringing of the morning bell, also designated.
11. Any room, occupied by students, will, at all times, be subject to the visitation of the Teachers of the Institution, who are required to see that the regulations are complied with.
12. Students will be required to keep their own rooms in good order, and to pay all unnecessary damages, either of rooms or of furniture furnished with the rooms.

REGULAR ACADEMIC EXERCISES.

The regular exercises, at which all the students will be required to attend, unless specially excused, are, Chapel exercises each morning during the term; Recitations, from two to four, five days each week, from Monday morning till Friday evening. Compositions and Declamations, one-half day, once in two weeks, Literary, Scientific, and Moral Lectures by the Principals. Public Worship, once in each week, either on Saturday or Sunday, according as the students may be in the habit of keeping the Sabbath, either on the seventh or first day of the week.

GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the students will be in the hands of the Principals, and will be strictly and steadily exercised, and at the same time, strictly parental. The object of our academic government being to secure the greatest possible amount of physical, intellectual, and moral good to the students themselves, regularity and order of exercises, and good and wholesome citizens to society. No unwarrantable means will be made use of to enforce the observance of the above regulations; yet our constant endeavor will be, to make the means resorted to as effective as humun means may be.

Parents who place their children in this Institution, and all students who are sufficiently old to understand the necessity of order, cannot be too well assured that the foregoing regulations form the most essential part of the contract between them and us; and that whatever student wantonly violates them, and shows himself incorrigibly determined on pursuing his waywardness, will be expelled from the privileges of the Institution, and will not be permitted to re-enter it again, without special proof of reformation. Nor will an expelled student have any deduction made from full term charges.

Farther, parents are requested not to place money for expenses, in the hands of students who are not old enough to use money with discretion and economy. Either of the Principals, or the Book-keeper of the Institution, will act as fiscal guardian of such students without charge.

ADMISSION.

Candidates for admission as students, must present testimonials of good moral character, or be known to possess such a character, and must be willing to comply unreservedly with the foregoing regulations; and no one will be permitted to receive instructions in any class, until all academic bills, for the term in prospect, be paid or satisfactorily arranged.

ACADEMIC TERMS.

The Academic Year for 1848–9 consists of three terms, as follows:

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1848, and ending Thursday, November 23, 1848.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, December 5, 1848, and ending Thursday, March 15, 1849.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, April 3, 1849, and ending July 12, 1849.

As the plan of instruction in this Institution, laid out for each class, will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue through the term, and accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the terms.

N. B. Students who are expecting to teach during the winter or summer, will specify such intention on entering in the beginning of the fall or spring term; and, for the special accommodation of such, a day will be set apart at first, on which they can leave, if they wish; and they will not be permitted to leave on any other day, nor will any other than teachers be permitted to leave on the day specified.

Farther, it is of the utmost importance that the student be present at the day of the opening of the term, as on that and the succeeding day, the students entering are examined and classified.

It is also suggested to parents who patronize this Institution from the distance of a few miles around, that students should go home only once during the term, as every absence from classes is always attended with disadvantages to the student. This is a suggestion, and not imperative. But to meet this suggestion, the exercise of the school will close at noon on the seventh Friday in each term, and open again on the afternoon of Monday following.

EXPENSES.

THE JUDGES JUDGED—NO. 4.

FALSE CONSTRUCTIONS.

The way of uprightness is like the way that leadeth unto life. "Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, and few there be that find it," while under the influence of the popular will. An upright judge is careful about assuming premises that are disputed by sober-minded men, or that are likely to injure the interests of worthy individuals. We think the principles of equity, and the history of the most illustrious judges of the earth, will bear us out in these remarks. It would be a relief to our minds to see the evidence of these in the "Opinion" of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. We are painfully surprised at the assumptions and misconstructions contained in the documents put forth by that Court in the Sabbatarian case. We owe it to ourselves, and to the cause of truth which we represent, to refute them before the world.

Judge Bell has decided, that the Act of Assembly which "prohibits, inter alia, any person to do or perform any worldly employment or business whatever on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, works of necessity or charity only excepted," is "a civil regulation," working only incidental worldly disadvantages, temporal injuries, it may be, to Jews and seventh-day Christians"—"conferring no superior religious position upon those who worship on the first day of the week"—"the law intends no preference--establishes no preference,"--"interferes not with the rights of conscience." Can it be that Judge Bell is so demented upon this subject as honestly to believe all these positions truthful? Let those think so who can. We inquire what ground Judge Bell has to construe the Sunday Act of Assembly as but "a civil regulation?" Is there any thing in the language of the Act to warrant such a construction? Every thing the reverse. The prohibited employment or business is particularly designated as worldly, in opposition to religious or charitable. A man may get up his team and ride twenty miles to a place of worship on that day, and it will not be considered worldly business; but if he cart one load of manure twenty rods on his own farm, it is worldly business, and finable by Act of Assembly, inter alia, whether he be a first-day or a seventh-day Christian, or a Jew. All the terms of the law which classify the employment allowed or prohibited, and those which designate the day, are of religious signification, and designed to surround it with religious considerations; and hence the transgression of this law is usually regarded as a crime; the courts treat it as neither trespass nor misdemeanor, but as vice, a transgression of divine and public law. It has rarely been tried by jury; it is regarded as a sin punishable by the magistrate. This is Judge Coulter's view of it. He says that it comes to us as a holy day—it is part of the common law of the State. In the absence of all evidence of such design on the part of the Legislature, we can see no good reason why the Judge should construe the Act for the observance of Sunday, or Lord's day, as a civil regulation. It appears to us assumed for the purpose of evading an equitable decision of the Sabbatarian case; designed to throw it out of reach of the argument of the plaintiff's counsel.

The Judge's decision, that it works only an incidental, temporary, worldly disadvantage to the Jew and the seventh-day Christian, is an inconsiderate and unfeeling assumption. To be deprived of the opportunities of worldly employment and business one-sixth part of our time, is a grievous wrong to ourselves and our families—an exaction more oppressive than any tithe law ever enacted on earth. It is commonly affirmed, by the most strenuous advocates of the first day, that one day's rest in seven is enough; all over that, therefore, is a dead loss to those from whom it is exacted. This disadvantage, so far from being temporary, is a regularly-returning one every week in the year, and now made permanent, so far as the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania is concerned. The mercy of the Court in this matter is like the pity of the Inquisition; it professes the good of the poor victim, while it holds him fast and gives another turn to the thumb-screws.

The pretence, that it confers no superior religious position upon those who worship on the first day of the week, is contrary to all observation and fact. It is well known, that governmental sanctions always give authority and influence to social institutions and their advocates in the eyes of the multitude, who seldom think for themselves; it is the natural operation of it. This was the design of the Sunday laws when first enacted by Constantine, and of their reënactment by succeeding States to the present time. To say that the law intends no preference, is a pitiful subterfuge. The question is, Does it work a preference? Common sense says, Yes. And were it not so, we could not account for the anxiety of the zealous advocate of the Christian Sabbath, who show so much solicitude for their continuance. As well might the hierarchists of England pretend that the law which establishes the Episcopal Church as the State Church, exacting tithes of the Dissenter for its support, works only an incidental disadvantage, temporarily injurious, it may be, to Baptists and Presbyterians; the law intends no preference! Everybody knows that it works a superior religious position, and works a positive and perpetual impediment to the cause of dissent. It is just so with Seventh-day Baptists and the Sunday law of Pennsylvania. It is pretended, that "it leaves all free alike in the exercise of their distinctive religious tenets, saying to none, what doest thou?" What cruel and inconsiderate language is this! Go into the hovel of the Irish peasant, after the tithe master has taken away his cow and his pig, and what has he left to pay his own chosen minister? How does he stand in the eyes of his vaunting Protestant neighbor? Go to the cottage of the Seventh-day Baptist, at the year's end, when fifty-two days' works have been wrung from him by the operation of the Sunday laws, and how does he stand in reference to the support of his family, and the ministry of his choice? His spirits are broken down, and his enterprise crushed. Listen to the remarks of his Sunday-keeping neighbors in regard to his Sabbath sentiments, with this discrimination made by the law of the State! He is looked upon as a proscribed man. The Judge treats the subject as though there were no limitations of human circumstances; and insinuates that when the State has taken what it will for the support of Sunday, it leaves the victim of its exactions whole to pursue his own sense of duty to God and his family. Whether the Judge meant it so or not, his mode of reasoning on the subject is as tantalizing to Seventh-day Baptists, as the remarks of the Egyptian task-masters to the Israelites, when, having withheld straw, they exacted their full tale of brick, and when they complained of their hardship, replied, "Ye are idle, ye are idle." We do not accuse the Judge of a persecuting spirit, but such is the working of the position he has taken. It is said that the Emperor Nicholas is one of the most amiable of men in his own family; but the working of his policy towards the unfortunate Poles makes him appear cruel as a tiger. This is always the working of a legal invasion of natural rights. It is a natural consequence of leaving all rights to majorities or despots. Hence the wisdom of the framers of our constitution in reserving rights to the people individually, which no human authority can justly interfere with. These rights the Legislature and the Courts of Pennsylvania have invaded in the persons of the Seventh-day Baptists and the Jews. To evade a charge of infraction of our organic laws in this particular, Judge Bell says, "It pretends not to interfere with the rights of conscience; in this, as in other respects, the conscience of each is left uncontrolled by legal coercion, to pursue its own inquiries, and to adopt its own conclusions." The language of the Judge is quite guarded here, but its sophistry is easily detected. We have already remarked, that it matters not so much what the law intends, as what it works. If it works a wrong upon conscience, it is as really an infraction of the organic law as though it was intended. It is true, in relation to thinking for ourselves and adopting our own conclusions, the Sunday Act of Assembly leaves us uncontrolled. The Judge means that we may be Jews or Seventh-day Christians, and repudiate in our own minds all Sunday notions, but we must rest on Sunday! And is it pretended that this was the meaning of the authors and founders of our civil constitutions? Shades of Jefferson, Washington, and Franklin, speak from your graves! Would you not abhor such pitiful hypocrisy as to pretend to permit by legal provision the free exercise of thought, while ye forbid the practice of sober religious convictions of duty? If the constitutions have any meaning, it is as Judge Gibson has expounded it, to "Secure the right TO DO or to FORBEAR TO DO, any act for conscience sake, the forbearing or doing of which is not prejudicial to the public weal."

The Court was informed that a coerced rest on the first day of the week is contrary to the consciences of Seventh-day Baptists, because it takes away a standing protest against the perversion of one of God's holy institutions. The Judge, neither fearing God nor regarding man in this thing, says, "We cannot assent to this." So long as no attempt is made by legal enactments to stop our thinking and speaking, we must be free! So the Judge decides. But there is an old maxim which the Judge may have learned, and which it is evident the Christian Sabbath people understand, viz., "Actions speak louder than words." While our actions on these matters are constrained, our consciences are not free. Besides this, we believe that the specification of the law, "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work," as really requires us to secularize the specified six days in the order in which Jehovah created all things, as it does to sanctify the seventh day. It is requisite to the integral completeness of the holy Sabbath time—essentially connected with maintaining in due order that sacred hebdomadal division of time which Jehovah made in the beginning. Then there are some poor men among us to whom the full benefit of six days labor is absolutely necessary to a life of honesty and godliness. All these things are of no account in the eyes of the Court; the Judge does not believe that we have so construed the law. It matters not who alledges it, Jew or Christian, the present and former Courts "have rightly repudiated such a notion." And further, the Court kindly condescends to construe the law for us! That is, the Court, in a cramp, charitably substitutes its own conscience for ours! because the Act of Assembly "does not pretend to interfere with the rights of conscience." Why is this rightly done? Because the sects cannot bear such living testimony against their perversion of Jehovah's holy law! A summary way of getting rid of difficulty, to be sure! But if Courts may have this power, to say what shall be matters of conscience and what not; if they may of right say what is the extent of religious institutions and what not; they may of right repudiate and put down the conscientious notion of the plaintiff. Then the constitutions are no better than the paper of a wasp's nest; it may nourish the young wasps until they are big enough to come out and sting, but can be no protection to any other creature.

"LIVE TO DO GOOD."

BY GEORGE W. BETHUNE.

Live to do good; but not with thought to win
From man reward for any kindness done;
Remember Him who died on cross for sin,
The merciful, the meek, rejected One,
When He was slain, for crime of doing good,
Canst thou expect return of gratitude?

Do good to all; but while thou servest best
And at thy greatest cross, nerve thee to bear,
When thine own heart with anguish is opprest,
The cruel taunt, the cold, averted air,
From lips which thou hast taught in hope to pray,
And eyes whose sorrows thou hast wiped away.

Still do thou good, but for His holy sake,
Who died for thine, fixing thy purpose ever
High as His throne, no wrath of man can shake.
So shall he own thy generous endeavor.
And take thee to His conqueror's glory up,
When thou hast shared the Saviour's bitter cup.

Do nought but good, for such the noble strife
Of virtue is, 'gainst wrong to venture love,
And for thy foe devote a brother's life,
Content to wait the recompense above,
Brave for the truth, to fiercest insult meek,
In mercy strong, in vengeance only, weak. [Knick.

POSITION OF THE FRIENDS OF FREEDOM AT THE NORTH.

It is the object of this communication to give an outline of the proceedings of the Great National Convention at Buffalo. In a subsequent number, we may consider its bearing upon the subject of slavery, and the coming Presidential campaign. Says the Buffalo Morning Express of Aug. 12, a Taylor paper, "It would evince a want of candor in us, after what we have observed during its session, to deny that it was very large in point of numbers—that it combined signal ability—that it was highly respectable in the character of its delegates—that it was exceedingly enthusiastic and unanimous in its actions, and, so far as the great mass is concerned, was inspired with an honest zeal. We say this much of the Buffalo Convention, from a pure sense of justice." In regard to the magnitude of the Convention, no accurate estimate can be made. Says President Mahan, of Oberlin, "Not only was it impossible to number this vast mass of individuals, but there could be found no place in the city of sufficient magnitude to measure it. Buffalo was literally filled to overflowing. This innumerable concourse is variously estimated from at sixty to eighty thousand; and to show that this estimate is not at all improbable, the following facts may be adduced. On Wednesday, between the hours of 4 and 9 A. M., there arrived upon ten western steamboats the immense number of 5,800, as given by the clerks of the boats; and on Friday there was not less than three miles of empty cars on the eastern railroad for returning the delegates. Similar facts might be mentioned with respect to other conveyances; but these are sufficient to justify the estimate above made.

The Convention was composed of the Liberty Party, Dissenting Whigs, and Barnburners. Throughout all their proceedings, the utmost fairness was observed—not a committee was raised during the session but was composed of an equal number from each party. The Convention was any thing but an assembly to ratify a previous nomination. "The utmost harmony and good-will has marked every stage of its action. The Barnburners particularly have redeemed themselves thoroughly from the imputations cast upon them by interested individuals, of desiring to control the nomination." Nearly at the close of the afternoon session, on Wednesday, Mr. B. F. Butler, of New York, moved a committee of three—one Barnburner, one Whig, and one Liberty man—from each State, and the same number from the District of Columbia, to report resolutions for the consideration of the Convention. This committee included several of the leading men in the Liberty Party. Equality and fairness was observed, also, in appointing conferees to select a President and Vice-President. The Committee on Resolutions reported the following platform, which was received with acclamation as the basis upon which the man nominated at that Convention must stand. This platform was considered to embrace all the essential and distinctive principles of the Liberty Party. That it was so understood by the party itself, may be inferred from the fact, that as soon as on the ground, the Liberty Party called a special Convention, and passed resolutions that they would not yield an inch of principle even for harmony. "We will not go for Van Buren, nor any other man, unless he will go for the distinctive principles of our Party." Says Dr. Teft, a Liberty Party delegate, "Hale was also given up at his own request, as expressed by Mr. Lewis, who had just returned from New England, where he had conversed with him on the subject."

Since the readers of the Recorder have been favored with the principles of the Liberty Party, and its relation to other parties, as given by its friends at Oberlin, we deemed it important that they should also have the grounds taken by the great Convention at Buffalo, and which are believed to embrace all the distinctive principles of the Liberty Party.

Whereas, We have assembled in Convention as a union of Freemen for the sake of Freedom, forgetting all past political differences in a common resolve to maintain the rights of Free Labor against the aggressions of the Slave Power, and to secure Free Soil for a Free People:

And Whereas, The political Conventions recently assembled at Baltimore and Philadelphia, the one stifling the voice of a great constituency entitled to be heard in its deliberations, and the other abandoning its distinctive principles for more availability, have dissolved the national party organizations heretofore existing, by nominating for the Chief Magistracy of the United States, under slave-holding dictation, candidates, neither of whom can be supported by the opponents of slavery extension without a sacrifice of consistency, duty, and self-respect:

And Whereas, These nominations so made furnish the occasion and demonstrate the necessity of the union of the people under the banner of Free Democracy, in a solemn and formal declaration of their independence of the Slave Power, and of their fixed determination to rescue the Federal Government from its control:

Resolved, therefore, That we, the people here assembled, remembering the example of our Fathers in the days of the first Declaration of Independence, putting our trust in God for the triumph of our cause, and invoking his guidance in our endeavors to advance it, do now plant ourselves upon the National Platform of Freedom in opposition to the Sectional Platform of Slavery.

Resolved, That Slavery, in the several States of this Union which recognize its existence, depends upon State laws alone, which cannot be repealed or modified by the Federal Government, and for which laws that Government is not responsible. We therefore propose no interference by Congress with slavery within the limits of any State.

Resolved, That the proviso of Jefferson, to prohibit the existence of slavery, after 1800, in all the Territories of the United States, Southern and Northern; the votes of six States and sixteen delegates in the Congress of 1784, for the proviso, to three States and seven delegates against it; the actual exclusion of slavery from the Northwestern territory by the ordinance of 1787, unanimously adopted by the States in Congress; and the entire history of that period, clearly show that it was the settled policy of the nation not to extend, nationalize, or encourage, but to limit, localize, and discourage slavery; and to this policy, which should never have been departed from, the government ought to return.

Resolved, That our Fathers ordained the Constitution of the U. S., in order, among other great national objects, to establish justice—promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of Liberty; but expressly denied to the Federal government, which they created, all constitutional power to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due legal process.

Resolved, That in the judgment of this Convention, Congress has no more power to make a slave than to make a king; no more power to institute and establish slavery, than to institute or establish a monarchy; no such power can be found among those specifically conferred by the Constitution, or derived by just implication from them.

Resolved, That it is the duty of the Federal government to relieve itself from all responsibility for the existence or continuance of slavery wherever that government possesses constitutional authority to legislate on that subject, and is thus responsible for its existence.

Resolved, That the true, and in the judgment of this Convention, the only safe means of preventing the extension of slavery into territory now free, is to prohibit its existence in all such territory by an act of Congress.

Resolved, That we accept the issue which the slave power has forced upon us, and to their demand for more slave States and more slave territories, our calm but final answer is, No more slave States, no more slave territory. Let the soil of our extensive domains be ever kept free, for the hardy pioneers of our own land and the oppressed and banished of other lands, seeking homes of comfort and fields of enterprise in the new world.

Resolved, That the Bill lately reported by the Committee of Eight in the Senate of the U. S., was no compromise, but an absolute surrender of the rights of the non-slaveholders of all the States; and while we rejoice to know that a measure which, while opening the door for the introduction of slavery into territories now free, would also have opened the door for the introduction of litigation and strife among the future inhabitants thereof to the ruin of their peace and posterity, was defeated in the House of Representatives, its passage in hot haste, by a majority embracing several Senators who voted in open violation of the known will of their constituents, should warn the people to see to it that their representatives be not suffered to betray them. There must be no more compromises with slavery. If made, they must be repealed.

Resolved, That we demand freedom and established institutions for our brethren in Oregon, now exposed to hardships, peril, and massacre, by the reckless hostility of the slave power to the establishment of free government for free territories, and not only for them, but for our new brethren in California and New Mexico.

And whereas, it is due not only to this occasion, but to the whole people of the United States, that we should also declare ourselves on certain other questions of national policy, therefore,

Resolved, That we demand cheap postage for the people; a retrenchment of the expenses and patronage of the Federal government; the abolition of all unnecessary offices and salaries, and the election by the people of all civil officers in the service of the government, so far as the same may be practicable.

Resolved, That River and Harbor improvements, when demanded by the safety and convenience of commerce with foreign nations or among the several States, are objects of national concern, and that it is the duty of Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, to provide therefor.

Resolved, That the free grant to actual settlers, in consideration of the expenses incurred in making settlements in the wilderness, which are usually fully equal to their actual cost, and of the public benefits resulting therefrom, of reasonable quantities of the public lands, under suitable limitations, is a wise and just measure of public policy, which will promote in various ways the interests of all the States in the Union, and we therefore recommend it to the favorable consideration of the American people.

Resolved, That the obligations of honor and patriotism require the earliest practicable payment of the national debt, and we are therefore in favor of such a tariff of duties as will raise revenue adequate to defray the necessary expenses of the Federal government and pay said debt.

Respecting the Convention, we would notice the following facts:—1st. It was undoubtedly the most serious, the most religious, political Convention that ever assembled in this republic. The members, spontaneously and unbeknown to each other, separated into groups to invoke the blessing and guidance of Almighty God upon their proceedings. When this fact became known, a general prayer-meeting was held in the tent, (for the Convention, on account of its great magnitude, was held at the park in the Oberlin tent,) and politicians, ministers, lawyers, and statesmen, bowed to Heaven for their country's good. 2d. Perhaps a body more harmonious in all its measures never convened. When the Nominating Committee announced Martin Van Buren as the candidate who would come up upon the platform which they had adopted, he was received with long and deafening cheers. Then might have been seen old and inveterate foes clasping each others hands in mutual friendship, while tears of gratitude attested the sincerity of their professions. Party distinctions seemed to be lost—entirely merged into the common element of Freedom. 3d. It is evident that the Liberty Party, as a party, no longer exists; the North has arisen, en masse, and planted her columns upon abolition ground; she is now marshaling her ranks against the South—against slave power; it is no longer Whig and Democrat, but Liberty and Slavery—North and South. The Liberty Party has been the germ that has produced this glorious result; and now it is hoped that all her friends will enlist heartily in this new movement. "There is a tide in the affairs of men, which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune."

CHARLES LAMB AND HIS SISTER.

"Little," says the British Quarterly Review, "did the majority of those who saw this social, punning, gentle, frolicsome, stammering, quaint humorist, imagine the awful shadow which for ever rested on his spirit, mingling with and deepening by contrast the brightness of its sunshine."

The tragedy here referred to was the killing of her own mother by Mary Lamb in a fit of insanity brought on by overworking herself with the needle for the support of both her aged parents.

"This ghastly incident," says the Reviewer, "gave a new shape to all Lamb's subsequent career. At that time he was in love, the only time he had ever felt the passion, and it inspired, 'a few sonnets of very delicate feeling and exquisite music;' but he felt that his sister demanded all his care, and to her he sacrificed love, marriage, everything. Like a brave, suffering, unselfish man, he, at twenty-one, renounced the dream of love for the stern austerity of duty:—

"And let him grieve who cannot choose but grieve
That he hath been an Elm without his Vine,
And her bright dower of clustering charities,
That round his trunk and branches might have clung
Enriching and adorning. Unto thee,*
Not so enriched, not so adorned, to thee
Was given a sister * * * *
In whom thy reason and intelligent heart
Found—for all interests, hopes, and tender cares,
All softening, humanizing, hallowing powers—
More than sufficient recompense."

If singleness of heart and unshaken constancy of affection could make a recompense for all he had renounced, then truly did Charles Lamb reap his reward. But we have only to put it to the reader's consideration, and he will at once acknowledge how noble a sacrifice it was which Lamb performed. We do not mean the mere renouncement of his hopes: it is not any one act, it is his whole life, which we call heroic. To his sister he devoted himself, in the most absolute sense of the term; and that in spite of recuring fits of insanity. Curiously enough, Mary Lamb was, as a friend of hers once said to us, "the last woman in the world whom you could have suspected, under any circumstances, of becoming insane, so calm, so judicious, so rational was she;" and Hazlitt used to say, "Mary Lamb is the only truly sensible woman I ever met with." Nevertheless, she was at no time free from the danger of a relapse, and they never left home without her brother's taking a strait waistcoat with him!

GODLINESS AND GAIN.

"Quiet Sundays.—The Syracuse Recorder, speaking of the discontinuance of Sunday trains on the Albany and Buffalo Railroad, says:—'We are at length to have quiet Sundays—so far as the passage of the cars is concerned—the chief annoyance to devout people on the line of the railroads. Where the credit of this consummation is due, we know not. We presume that the Postmaster General has had as much agency in the matter as any individual, as we have observed a progressive discontinuance of Sunday mail routes, by his order, as we suppose. The main reason we have heard given for the continuance of Sunday trains from Albany to Buffalo has been the necessity of them to carry the mail. This is now dispensed with, and the several companies have promptly discontinued their trains. In the name of the religious community, we thank them, though there is no reason to suppose they have made the least sacrifice to do it. It has long been settled, that Sunday trains did not pay expenses; and, even if they were profitable, a single thought is sufficient to convince any one that it would be more so to do the week's work in six days than in seven; since the railroad, from the nature of the case, monopolizes the travel. We therefore congratulate the stockholders on the advantages they are likely to experience in pursuing a course so grateful to the religious public.'"

The above paragraph is going the rounds, from which we judge that the spirit of it is generally approved. But for our part we see in it little to approve, and much to condemn. The long and short of the matter, according to this article, is, that the railroad companies between Albany and Buffalo monopolize the travel in that direction, and conceiving that they can make more money by doing the work in six days of the week than they can by doing it in seven, they have determined to discontinue the Sunday trains, and so put money into their own pockets, even if they take it out of the pockets of poor travelers who happen to be caught on their line, and compelled to lie over one day at expensive hotels. For doing this, the editor of a religious paper, "in the name of the religious community," presumes to thank them. As one of "the religious community," we deny their claim to any such thanks. Had they become convinced that it was wicked—a sin against God—to run their trains on Sunday, and discontinued them on that account, we could have respected them, and perhaps thanked them, for carrying out their conscientious convictions, though we might not have been able to see any reason for such convictions. But to thank them for discommoding a part of the traveling public—even if it be an ungodly part—simply because they have the monopoly of business, and can make more money by doing so, is more than we can consent to. Besides, we see, or think we see, that the application of this principle might be made exceedingly oppressive, even to "the religious community." Suppose these companies, after trying the experiment of lying still one day in the week, should conclude that they can make more money by lying still two days in the week, and doing a week's work in five days; who, that has approved the above article, can consistently deny their right to do so, or refuse to thank them for consulting their own interest in that case? Now although we have no particular desire to have the cars from Albany to Buffalo run on Sunday, we do desire to see monopolies kept within bounds, which we do not believe will ever be secured by bestowing upon them the thanks of the religious community for consulting their own financial interests rather than the interests of the public.

There is another feature of this business which we cannot observe without pain. The time has been, when the religious community attached a sort of sacredness to the Sunday, not because the law of the land enjoined its observance, and the interests of society were promoted thereby, but because its observance was supposed to be in some way connected with God's commandment. For a few years past, however, a class of pseudo-reformers have satiated the community with tracts and lectures, the main design of which seems to have been, to prove that the keeping of Sunday is a very profitable business, enabling man and beast to do more work, and generally increasing the incomes of those who carry out the doctrine in their practice. To support this notion, the certificates of numerous eminent doctors have been obtained, and great conventions have been got up to hear the speeches of distinguished statesmen to the same effect. All this kind of manœuvering has served to create an impression in the public mind, that what theologians represent as an institution of God, is simply "a civil regulation adopted for the good of society." Thus sabbatizing has been gradually removed from the substantial foundation of God's Word, upon which it originally rested, and placed upon the sandy foundation of human expediency, either as relates to the health of individuals or the good of society. Who needs to be told, that the consequences of this course must be disastrous in the long run? Men may, for the time being, and while the thing is popular, be induced to cease from their labors on Sunday, and even to discontinue the Sunday trains on their railroads; but just so soon as the thing becomes unpopular, or their interests seem to them to dictate a different course, they will return to their old customs seven-fold worse than they were before. Such obsequious palaver as that from the Religious Recorder, which heads this article, is exactly the stuff for men whose godliness is regulated by their gains. We loathe it, because we believe its influence is to sap the foundations upon which every religious institution ought to rest. And "if the foundations be removed, what can the righteous do?"

"Poor Humanity."—Under this head the editor of the Boston Reporter says:—"A set of philanthropists set out for Buffalo on an errand of salvation to the country, and charter a boat to take them up the Hudson River on Sunday morning! Fierce for freedom, and setting an example that is most ruinous to every interest of the nation!" Nor is this all. He has farther learned, "that Hon. Daniel Webster, leaving his farm in Marshfield, and hastening back to Washington, to meet a great crisis in his country's affairs, departed from New York on Sunday. May God have mercy on a nation whose men of leading influence know no Sabbath!" These facts seem to alarm the editor of the Reporter—and well they may; but we think they ought not to astonish him, since they are the natural results of the views which he has been most zealous in inculcating. If religious men and Sabbath-reformers, to get rid of the claims of the true Sabbath, treat the institution as a mere "civil regulation designed for the good of society," and requiring only "a seventh part of time," they ought to expect that ungodly men will consult their own convenience, and keep that seventh part which they please. But if these reformers desire a Sabbath, as they profess, let them take that which God has appointed, and enforce it by "thus saith the Lord." Then men will believe that they are honest and in earnest.

GENEROUS SYMPATHY.

The Barbers.—Much anxiety is experienced among the barbers of the city and county, in consequence of the enforcement of the Act of April, 1794, against them. The law says, "If any person shall do or perform any worldly employment or business whatever, on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, works of necessity and charity only excepted, or shall use or practice any unlawful game, hunting, shooting, sport or diversion whatever, on the same day, and be convicted thereof, every such person so offending shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay four dollars," &c. From the time of the passage of the law, for aught we know to the contrary, down to the recent decision of the Supreme Court, the business of the barber was regarded as a work of necessity. People of all religious denominations, regular church-goers, did not deem it an offence against religion to engage the services of a barber. But now a more refined state of morality exists, and those who believe that a cleanly person is pleasing both in the sight of God and man, are forced to shave themselves upon that day. Within the last month there have been various complaints made before magistrates, and different constructions put upon the Act—some of the aldermen have discharged the defendants under the belief that shaving on the Sabbath is a work of necessity—others literally construe the act, and believing that it was intended to apply to every species of labor, except such as is specified, in every case impose the penalty. Some of the individuals who have been fined, from fear of a repetition of the charge, have been compelled to close their shops, and are now engaged in prosecuting others for the purpose of making the suspension of business general. Those who are immediately interested in this subject should take steps to have the question decided by the most undoubted authority, or speedily cause the defect of the law to be supplied by a special enactment, about which there could exist no difference of opinion. [Phil. Ledger, Aug. 17.

When our Snowhill brethren were suffering under malicious prosecutions for engaging in "worldly employments" on the first day of the week, after having faithfully and devoutly celebrated the Sabbath of the Lord, on the day and in the manner prescribed by the mighty Jehovah—and during their application to the Legislature of that State, asking exemption, in virtue of being true Sabbath-keepers, from the onerous burdens of the Act of April 22d, 1794—and pending their appeal to the Supreme Court, for the restoration of their constitutional rights—even through that long and perplexing struggle to maintain their equal rights and religious immunities, in common with other citizens of the State—the public press, with few very rare exceptions, was silent—spoke not a word in their behalf, or offered the least sympathy to the persecuted, the oppressed. With all the rank injustice of the partial and invidious law, depriving them of a sixth of their precious time, in addition to that (the seventh day) they cheerfully and conscientiously devoted, according to the requirement of their Father in heaven, yet the press was profoundly silent, perfectly dumb; they looked on superciliously, and witnessed the injustice and the oppression, without heralding one word of the gross infringement on our rights, or of the violation of the Constitution of the land. But now, when the Knights of the Razor and Curling Tongs, who plead no conscientious scruples—who observe no day unto the Lord—who give no portion of time to sacred rest—but who resist relinquishing a single hour from "worldly employments," for gain—are assailed, we find the press loud in expressions of sympathy—(forsooth each barber takes a few daily papers to engage the attention of his customers while waiting their turn)—aye, have a great deal of sympathy, generous sympathy, for the obstreperous barbers.

O, shame, shame, where is thy blush! No word to encourage and sustain honest, oppressed Sabbath-keepers, under persecution and oppression, for the conscientious discharge of their religious duties—duties imposed by the Lord of heaven and earth—not a single line to palliate their occupying a day which neither they nor the Scriptures regard as sacred, holy time, in "the pursuit of happiness," guaranteed by the Magna Charta, the quiet occupation of providing a livelihood for their families, on their own farms, in their secluded settlements, without meddling or interfering with the rights of any of their neighbors—yet, they can be passed by, and sympathy, generous sympathy, expressed, nay, voluntarily lavished upon men performing "worldly labor" in the very heart of the crowded city, without any regard to any day whatever.

As these generous sympathizers suggest, that "the defect in the law should be supplied by special enactment," it would be well for our friends in Pennsylvania to be awake to their own interests, and endeavor to find some one generous enough to be on the watch and take care that their rights be attended to, should the Legislature extend a privilege (not granted to any others) to a particular class of the handicraft—or, to regain our rights, we may have, all, to turn barbers! ## EFFECT OF MISSIONARY LABOR.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

As an advocate of the cause of missionary exertions, I send you an extract from the Journal of Commander Wilkes, of the United States Exploring Expedition, while exploring the savage and heathen islands of the great South Sea; which contains a relation of their visit to three small islands in the Paumoto Group, in latitude 16 South, longitude 144 West. The inhabitants of the two first are heathen, and still enveloped in the darkness of pagan superstition and idolatry, without the light of the Sun of Righteousness to guide them in the ways of humanity and virtue. Their visit to the third will exhibit the contrast between paganism and Christianity.

"On the morning of the 24th, we were off the N. W. end of the Island of Wytoohee, in latitude 14 South, longitude 141 West. Many canoes came off to the ship; as they approached, the natives were heard while at some distance singing; and, as they drew near, the clamor increased, accompanied with much laughing and many gesticulations; but none of them could be induced to come on board, and they were not willing to part with any thing but some old matting. An attempt was made to get some of their paddles, but they rather ridiculed the idea of parting with them. In order to dispel their fears, articles were given them gratuitously; and by way of showing their gratitude, they began a monotonous song or chant. They would occasionally stop, look up, and return the laugh of the crew by a grin, apparently enjoying the sport as much as any of them. I sent one of the boats to the shore, with the interpreter, under Lieutenant Case, but they refused to allow them to land. No actual violence was attempted, but Lieutenant Case reported the impracticability of landing without opposition and injury to themselves and natives. They received several presents, but they had no fruit to give in exchange, as their cocoanuts were tabooed. They gave in exchange some articles, consisting of cloth, fish-hooks, adzes, and pearl shells.

"After the surveying duties were over, we found ourselves at the N. W. point of the Island. The natives, who had refused to allow us to land, were now seen waving green boughs, which is the general sign of good-will, and a desire to have communication, and many were seen dancing on the beach with their spears in their hands. I gave orders to send the boats to the shore, but on reaching it, we found them still averse to our landing; they, however, assisted Mr. Couthouy through the surf to the beach; but when he had reached it, they surrounded him, and led him back very gently to the water, making him distinctly understand, that they would not permit him to visit their huts. The Chief, who was a very old man, was seen lying under a Pandanos tree, close to the beach, and on being told that I wished to see him, and make him a present, he arose; his hair was quite grey, with a long stiff white beard; his legs were enlarged with the elephantiasis, the swelling being of a white color, and so large and regular, that many thought he had on sailor's trousers. About twenty natives were with him on the beach. After being showed the presents I had for him, he was induced to wade into the water up to his neck to receive them. In coming along side the boat, he seemed somewhat uneasy, until he had gone through the ceremony of rubbing noses, which I must confess was any thing but agreeable with so dirty and diseased a person. He was extremely anxious to get hold of the presents, and amused us by at once plunging them under the water, seeming in no manner concerned about keeping them dry. In return for my presents he at once offered me the short mantle of matting which he had over his shoulders."

The next day they visited another island of the same group, distant about 10 or 12 miles. Their reception was similar to that met with at the other islands. The natives presented them with mats made of the pandanos leaf, and pieces of worn out tapa, in return for many articles received, but would not suffer our people to put their feet upon dry ground, and when it was attempted, kept shoving them gently into the water. Some of the party having gone up to their huts, were at once seized, and shoved down towards the boat and into the surf, where they presented rather a ludicrous appearance, with the danger of drowning on the one side, and the natives on the other, who had them completely in their power, as they had neither arms nor any other means of defense. No harm, however, was done them, but the alarm incident to being threatened with spears. The only mishap met with was the loss by one of the gentlemen of a pair of spectacles, and a bruise or two from the coral in their hurried retreat. As the surf was heavy, life-preservers were sent to those who could not swim, and after much detention, they reached the boat in safety.

In the morning they bore away for Raraka, and as they approached they soon discovered a party of natives near the entrance of the lagoon. They were partly dressed, some in shirts without hats, others with vests, others again with trousers of all colors. They stood in for the mouth of the lagoon and landed.

"Nothing could be more striking than the difference that prevailed between these natives and those of the Disappointment Islands, which we had just left. The half-civilization of the natives of Raraka was very marked, and it appeared as though we had issued out of darkness into light. They showed a modest disposition, and gave us a hearty welcome. We were not long at a loss as to what to ascribe it; the missionary had been at work here, and his exertions had been based upon a firm foundation; the savage had been changed to a reasonable creature. Among the inhabitants was a native missionary, who had been instrumental in this work. If the missionaries had effected nothing else, they would deserve the thanks of all those who roam over this wide expanse of ocean, and incur its many unknown and hidden dangers. Here all shipwrecked mariners would be sure of kind treatment, and a share of the few comforts these people possess. No savage mistrust and fear were seen here. The women and children came about us, receiving our trifles. They showed much joy and curiosity at the sight of us, and were eager to supply our wants. I was particularly struck with the modest and quiet behaviour of the native missionary. He kept himself aloof, while all the others were crowding around to partake of the presents we were distributing, and seemed much gratified and astonished when I selected him out as the recipient of a present similar to the one I had given the chief. Though scarcely able to protect them from the weather, their huts are clean, and lined with mats. Their persons seemed cleanly also, and they showed a great disposition to oblige us. Some attention was paid to cultivation, as was evinced in the plantation and care of their cocoanut groves, as if wishing to provide for their future wants.

"This was the first island on which we observed the dawnings of Christianity and civilization. The native missionaries, although they are yet ignorant of most of the duties enjoined upon the Christian, still do much good in preparing the way. Many learn to read, and some even to write, under their tuition. We found here an Englishman who had belonged to a schooner engaged in the pearl fishery. He told me he had been left there sick by his captain, and had been kindly treated during his stay of three months on the island. I was in hopes of obtaining some information from him, but he knew little or nothing of the language, and was a stupid fellow. The chief of the Island had lost one hand, which he informed me had been bitten off by a shark while diving for shells. We became great friends, and he thought it necessary to be at my side the whole time. He was an odd old man, and proved before we left him, that he had become acquainted with some of the vices of civilization.

"On the next day we landed early and passed the whole of the day on shore making observations. We found this was taboo-day, or their Sabbath, although it was Saturday with us; and all the natives seemed to be enjoying its quiet repose. Few of them were to be seen, and they exhibited but little curiosity. No persuasion could induce them to employ themselves in getting fish and shells for us on this day.* We obtained a full set of observations to determine the position, and also those for magnetic results, and many specimens were here added to our collections.

"Towards sunset we all embarked, and my leave-taking with the old chief was quite amusing. He, with all his household and retinue, began to cry and whine over me so that I was glad to escape from the display of so much friendship and parental affection." J. S.

* By whom and at what time they were taught the observance of the Bible Sabbath, I cannot learn. It appears this was the first Island of this character Capt. Wilkes had visited.

More about Land-Turtles.—Daniel Babcock, Jr., of Hopkinton, R. I., has written us in relation to the remarkable instances of land-turtle longevity which we recently published. Strange as they appear, he thinks other equally remarkable cases might be found. When he was a small boy, (about the year 1795,) a lad living with his father brought in a turtle with a number of marks upon it. One was quite plain 1683; others were of later date, such as 1780, 1790, &c.; and there was one too old to be distinguished with certainty. After the examination, his father marked the turtle D. B., with the date, and let it go. About twelve years ago, Luke Crandall found this same turtle, and showed it to Mr. Babcock, who at once recognized the mark and date placed upon it by his father, which looked new and but little worn. Mr. B. also examined the oldest date then reported, 1683, which was all plain. He then looked for the still older date, said to have been indistinct, and found the letters and figures very much spread and filled up. The letters he endeavored to decipher, and concluded them to be J. M. (probably the initials of John Maxson, who formerly owned the land on which the turtle was found about 1795.) The date he supposed to be 1662, one year before the date of the Rhode Island Charter given by Charles II. Mr. Babcock has no doubt of the genuineness of the marks.

"Characteristics of Successful Benevolent Effort," is the title of an eight-page pamphlet on our table. It is the Circular Letter of the East New Jersey Baptist Association, written by Henry C. Fish, pastor of the Baptist Church at Somerville, and published in a form separate from the Minutes by request. After setting forth the special vocation of the church to enlighten, elevate, and purify the masses of unsanctified mind that surrounds her, the writer maintains that the efforts of the church, in order to be successful, must be characterized by universality, principle and system.

Temperance Discussion.—A very important discussion has been for some time past going on in Pittsburg, Pa., upon the question whether "the time has come when the Church of Christ should exclude from her communion those engaged in making and vending intoxicating liquors for common use?" On the affirmative were Rev. N. West, pastor of a Presbyterian Church, and Rev. James Rogers, D. D., pastor of an Associate Presbyterian Church. On the negative were Rev. Mr. Preston, rector of an Episcopal Church, and Rev. Mr. McLaren, pastor of an Associate Reformed Church. At the close of the first evening, Mr. Preston declined. At the close of the second evening, Mr. McLaren gave up any farther part in the debate. Others, however, have taken their places on the negative side. The greatest interest is manifested, and the discussion is likely to continue some time.

The Work of God in Arracan.—The Missionary Magazine for August, contains a letter from the Rev. Mr. Abbott, of the Arracan mission, which states that Tway Poh, a native preacher, had baptized during his absence to America six hundred native converts; and Myat Kyau, the other native preacher, had during the same period baptized five hundred and fifty. These have been formed into churches, and preachers appointed in each. Tway Poh had baptized one thousand previous to this, making in all sixteen hundred who have been baptized by this native preacher since his ordination. Mr. A. states that there are in Burmah to the north of Bassien and Pantanau, eight destitute districts, where twelve hundred converts are waiting for baptism.

Jews coming to this Country.—The Jewish Chronicle says that in consequence of the European commotions, "a thousand Jews in Pesth have resolved to depart for America, the rich undertaking to support the poor." There is plenty of room for them in this country, and we will give them a hearty welcome. But they ought to be cautioned against settling in the State of Pennsylvania, where they will be taxed by law to the tune of fifty-two days a year to support a 'civil regulation' which has been established by the "powers that be." What would William Penn have said to the suggestion, that this caution would one day be proper in relation to the State which bears his name?

Romanism in England.—A correspondent of the Reflector and Watchman says that the Church of Rome, at the present time, indulges high hopes of subduing the Church of England to her authority, and it must be confessed that she has some ground for hope. Sixty-five members of the University of Oxford have seceded from the Established Church, and conformed to the Church of Rome, since 1841; and about fifty more from the Universities of Cambridge and Dublin, making a total of more than one hundred; and this is very far from expressing the whole number who have been led by their teachings to apostacy from Protestantism.

Theological Education at the West.—The Western Baptist Education Society has recently decided that it cannot consistently look to the existing theological institutions for instruction to supply the West, but that the earliest possible location and endowment of a Theological Seminary is exceedingly desirable. The neighborhood of Cincinnati seems to be preferred as the location. The Executive Committee was instructed to enter into an extensive correspondence upon the subject, and report plans and proposals for donations, location, &c., at the next meeting of the Society.

Extensive Parish.—Eld. Jacob Knapp, the noted revival preacher, says that his "celebrated dwelling-house, in the village of Hamilton, N. Y., together with ten acres of land on which the house stands, will be sold very low, as he is about to locate his family in Illinois, that he may be nearer the center of his parish, which extends from the shores of the Atlantic to the shores of the Oregon, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth."

Blackwood's Magazine for August appeared with its usual promptness. The following is its table of contents, "Life in the Far West, No. 3;" "Art—its Progress;" "Kaffirland;" "The Caxtons, Part 5;" "Modern Tourism;" "Eighteen Hundred and Twelve;" "The Blue Dragon;" "Laurels and Laureates;" "The Horse-Dealer;" "Sketches in Paris." Published by L. Scott & Co., 79 Fulton street.

Madison University.—The Trustees of Madison University have decided, by a vote of 18 out of 19, to remove the institution from Hamilton to Rochester. The people of Hamilton talk of prosecuting the Education Society, who have the control of the property, and it is probable that the whole subject will have to be judicially investigated before the removal can take place.

New Jersey Baptist Institute.—A correspondent of the Christian Chronicle recommends New Brunswick as the proper location for the proposed Baptist Institution in New Jersey. It is thought that $12,000 will put it in operation.

Our Anniversaries.—We hope no one will forget, that the Anniversaries of our Missionary and Tract Societies occur next week at New Market, N. J. It is important that a full delegation be present. Let every friend who has it in his power attend.

General Intelligence.

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Britannia arrived at Boston in the afternoon of Sabbath last, bringing seven days later intelligence from Europe.

The rumors of a bloody battle in Ireland prove to have been unfounded. Wm. Smith O'Brien, M. P. for the County of Limerick and leader of the insurgents, was arrested on Saturday night, the 5th of August, at the railway station at Thurles. A special train immediately conveyed him to Dublin, where he is in prison. It seems that he did not find that cordial sympathy and co-operation among the disaffected Irish which he expected, and discovering that to harbor or shelter him would expose those who did so to arrest for treason, he resolved not to jeopard the poor peasants, but to visit his family at Limerick, and risk the consequences. The following is the account of his arrest published in the Dublin Evening Mail:—

"He was seen by a policeman named Hulme, in the employ of the Great Southern and Western Railroad Company, passing through the market-place, being dressed at the time in a brown overcoat, buttoned up to the throat, and a pair of thick gray trousers, the ends of which were turned up. He stopped Hulme, and asked him the way to the railway station, which he pointed out to him. Hulme sent a soldier for reinforcements, and without waiting their arrival, followed at once for the purpose of making the arrest. Mr. Smith O'Brien, on entering the railway station, asked for a second-class ticket to Limerick, which was immediately given him. In paying for his fare the clerk observed a great tremor in his hand, and an excitement in his manner calculated to rouse suspicion. The money which was given him was sixpence more than sufficient, but so great was Mr. O'Brien's agitation, that he neglected to take it up, and was recalled by the clerk for that purpose. On his return he asked which was the right platform, and being told, he crossed the railway and proceeded to a space of ground adjoining, to prevent observation. There he was at once taken into custody by Hulme, who, having called on him in the Queen's name to surrender himself, seized him by the right arm. He was immediately assisted by head-constable Hanniver, D., who carried the warrant for his arrest. Mr. O'Brien's back was turned when Hulme seized him, and said, 'You are Mr. O'Brien, and you are a prisoner.' Mr. Hanniver then seized Mr. O'Brien by the arm and said, 'I have a warrant for your arrest,' at the same time presenting a pistol, and adding, 'if you stir I'll shoot you."

The Freeman's Journal, in giving an account of conversations after the arrest, says:—

"Some of the officials present asked—'Did you not want to be the King of Munster?'—to which Mr. O'Brien replied. 'No, it is a gross lie, I did not. I had no such desire or idea, and nothing has caused me more pain and annoyance than the wretched falsehood to that effect which was printed in a Cork newspaper. It was a pure invention, as nothing of the kind ever fell from me. I entered upon my course with my eyes open to all the consequences, but those whom I expected to sustain me for the sake of the country did not do so. I know I shall be hanged; be it so. I am ready, and I have only to say, I have done my part for Ireland.'"

About fifty political prisoners are now on hand. Their trials have commenced at Dublin, but have not proceeded far. There are several others against whom warrants have been issued; the most important of whom, it is said, have proposed to the Irish Government, through an influential Catholic clergyman, to surrender themselves upon receiving assurance that none of the proceedings instituted against state prisoners shall extend to the taking of life. This is no doubt designed to save the life of O'Brien. Richard O'Gorman is said to have effected his escape in a ship bound for America. Warrants are out for the arrest of several American sympathizers, generally ex-Mexican volunteers of Irish descent.

France.

The Committee on Insurrections is making progress, and developing facts very unfavorable to M. Ledru-Rollin, who, it is now said, was to have been proclaimed Dictator, had the affair of April 16 been successful. An unsuccessful attempt has been made to assassinate M. Thiers.

The courts-martial in Paris have decided on the fate of about 2,300 prisoners. They have ordered the discharge of nearly 1,000; they have classed 1,100 among those to be transported; and they have sent 100 to be tried by superior courts-martial. Five hundred of the insurgents of June, sentenced to transportation, were transferred on the 5th inst. by railroad to Havre. Having been embarked in the Ulloa steam-frigate, they were to have sailed on the following morning for Brest, where they were to remain confined on board a hulk until the executive power should have fixed their destination.

Northern Italy.

The army of Charles Albert retreated from point to point before the Austrians, until they came to Milan, where they made a stand and fought, but were defeated. Some accounts say that Milan was taken by the Austrians, but others deny it.

Miscellaneous.

A serious collision took place at Breslau on the 31st ult., between the civic guard and troops of the line. Eight of the former were killed and 16 wounded; two of the latter were wounded. Another collision took place at Scweidnitz, south-west of Breslau, between the military and the people, in which some 12 or 15 of the latter were killed and wounded.

Martial law has been proclaimed at Pesth, and in the provinces of the Lower Danube. Letters from Pesth of the 30th ult. state that information had reached the Ministers that day, advising them of the storming of the Rouman encampments at Szegedin by the Hungarian troops, and the defeat of the insurgents.

TERRIBLE STEAMBOAT CALAMITY.—The St. Louis Republican, of Aug. 14, says that the fine steamer Edward Bates was towed into port by the Lucy Bertram, having collapsed two flues of her larboard boiler, at the head of West Port chute, one mile below Hamburg, Ill., at 4 o'clock on the morning of the 12th. She was on her way to Keokuk. Capt. Johnson had not long retired before the accident occurred. She had been running under a pretty good press of steam, but as she was at the time in shoal water, the engineer was letting off steam, and the boat was going at a slackened rate. This is the representation of passengers in the cabin, some of whom were awake at the time of the explosion. Two of the flues of the larboard boiler were collapsed, carrying every thing fore and aft, and dealing death to every one within the influence of the steam and of the missiles which were scattered on the lower deck. The destruction of life on deck and among the crew was appalling. Twenty-eight persons were killed, and thirty wounded.

THE WAY TO DO IT.—The Vermont Chronicle says that the Agawam Canal Company are about establishing a Factory Village in West Springfield, Mass., on the following principles. 1. The directors and agents are to be decidedly religious men. 2. No individual will be employed in the establishment who uses profane language, or intoxicating liquors, or violates the Sabbath, or is known to be in any respect immoral. 3. A place of worship will be provided and a Congregational minister established from the outset. The boarding houses will be kept by religious families, and the utmost care will be exercised in regard to the morals of the operatives, and to have a decidedly religious influence pervade the entire establishment—the object being to have a manufacturing establishment where Christian parents may safely trust the moral and religious interests of their children. The establishment is to go into operation about the 20th of September next. The agent intends that all the girls employed shall be from Vermont.

TERMINATION OF THE TRIALS AT WASHINGTON FOR NEGRO STEALING.—The cases of Drayton, Sears, and English, charged with negro stealing, have been disposed of finally. We learn from Baltimore, that Sears is sentenced to pay a fine, amounting in the aggregate to $14,800, to be imprisoned until the fine is paid. The punishment in the two convictions of Drayton will be not less than seven years in the Penitentiary in each case. If these convictions against Drayton are sustained by the Court above, the remaining charges will doubtless be dismissed. After disposing of this business, the Court adjourned till Monday, there being over forty new cases to be yet tried. English was discharged.

SUMMARY.

The Calais (Me.) Advertiser gives a singular account of the poisoning of a family of eight persons, in that town. The house being infested with rats, a quantity of poison, arsenic we suppose, was prepared to destroy them. The rats ate the arsenic, and feeling very thirsty under its burning operation ran to the water-pail. The poison was communicated to the water, and the family made use of it the next day. The whole of them were taken sick, but fortunately the drug was too much diluted to produce any fatal effects. By the aid of a physician they were relieved from all danger.

Sixty-six slaves ran away in a body, from the neighborhood of Lexington, Ky., a few days since, under a white man for a leader. On being discovered, they fought desperately, wounding one man and killing another; and it was not till the whole county was aroused that any considerable number of them were captured. The white leader was arrested, and the people were with great difficulty prevented from hanging him.

At Indianapolis, Ind., the other day, one lad bantered another to drink all the liquor he would buy. He was taken up at this offer—whiskey and brandy were brought out, and the drinking commenced. Dose after dose was taken, until the drinking youth had swallowed about a quart! He then became insensible, lingered about thirty-six hours, and died.

A new freight depot is now in process of erection at East Albany, N. Y., for the Albany and Boston Railroad Company, 750 feet in length by 133 in width. It is supposed that 1,300,000 bricks will be required in its construction, and the cost will be $100,000. It is to be completed in November, and will be the largest building in America.

The steamboat St. Nicholas, Capt. Rodman, while racing with the Cataline, Thursday afternoon last, struck on a rock at the entrance of Sawpit Harbor, and almost instantly filled. She ran about three hundred yards, and had nearly reached the dock, when she sunk to within two feet of the hurricane-deck. This took place in such a short time that several passengers, lying in the after cabin below, were floating in the water before they could escape. The Cataline took off the passengers, 150 in number, and carried them to Norwalk, Ct.

The Haverhill (N. H.) Gazette makes "honorable mention" of a returned volunteer, who went away with a company of 63, only 11 of whom are now living. He enlisted with a company in Portland, and has himself lost one eye, had a bayonet run into his body, and a ball shot through his knee. When he went away he left a wife and two children, and has returned to them "a used-up man," shattered in health and mutilated in body, and miserably poor.

A fire broke out at Auburn, N. Y., Thursday, Aug. 24. Messrs. Derbys' book establishment was burned down, together with several stores. The New Era printing office was more or less damaged from fire and water. The Post Office had to be temporarily removed on account of the progress of the flames. The total loss was about $30,000, which, however, was well insured.

An underground counterfeit establishment has been discovered at Brighton, near Boston. It is a room of twelve feet square, concealed under the cellar of a house nearly a century old. A keg half full of U. S. half dollars, dated in 1833, was found, with a machine for polishing coin. A murder was committed there some years ago.

There remains out, according to the statement of the Bank, about $40,000 of circulation which is an entire loss to the pockets of the public.

HOW MUCH THERE IS THAT'S BEAUTIFUL.

BY SOPHIA W. LLOYD.

How much there is that's beautiful
In this fair world of ours,
The verdure of the early spring,
The sweetly blooming flowers—
The brook that dances in the light—
The birds that carol free,
Are objects beautiful and bright
That everywhere we see.

There's beauty in the early morn,
When all is hushed and still—
And at the lovely sunset hour,
'T is spread o'er vale and hill—
It lives within the gorgeous clouds
That float along the sky—
And oh, how purely beautiful
Our evening canopy.

It dwells in quiet stillness where
The glassy waters glide,
And wakes to awful grandeur 'neath
The cataract's foaming tide;
'T is throned in dark, stern majesty,
Where the tall mountain towers—
Oh, there is beauty everywhere
In this bright world of ours.

The fairy spell that childhood wears—
Its artlessness and truth,
The light that lives within the eye
And in the smile of youth,
The impress on the manly brow,
Wrought with the shade of care,
That tells of high and noble thought,
How beautiful they are!

And life—how much is shed around,
To bless and cheer us here,
When strength and energy are found,
Its lesser ills to bear.
Although a cloud may sometimes rise,
A shadow sometimes rest
Upon our earthly pathway, still
'T is beautiful and blessed.

THE CAUSES OF IRISH MISERY.

'A Methodist Preacher' in the 'Christian Advocate and Journal,' repelling the misapprehensions of a former correspondent of that paper, gives the following synopsis of the wrongs and woes against which Ireland is now contending:—

1. The British Government has confiscated nearly every acre of land on that beautiful island from the original native owners, and has bestowed them on favorites, generally non-resident foreigners. At one time, out of the 20,000,000 acres of which the island is composed, there was a confiscation of 12,634,711. At another time, 1,718,320. In this way the land has been wrested from those whose ancestors had held and cultivated it before the period of authenticated history, and has been given in large districts from 113,000, 92,000 acres, down to smaller portions, so that, according to the London Times of last month, there are in all Ireland only about 8,000 proprietors of the soil in fee simple.

2. These proprietors, from caprice, taste, or misconceived ideas of interest, do not cultivate more than two-thirds of their vast domains, for the cultivation of a small portion of them, in most instances, will bring them in a princely revenue. The remainder must then be preserved for pleasure-grounds, hunting, or pasturage, so that, according to a recent survey, there is at this time 4,600,000 acres of good land that is unimproved. Thus the earth, or the land which the Lord hath given to the children of men for their use, and on which they were to subsist, by the "present order of things," is actually wrested from them at the point of the bayonet, while they to whom it was originally given are left to starve and die for the use of it.

"He takes my life who takes the means by which I live."

Shakspeare never put forth a more truthful saying. Who then are the destroyers of the hundreds of thousands in that fairest, richest isle of the ocean, if it be not those who have originated, and who still continue, the "present order of things?" None dare say that there is an unwillingness on the part of the Irish laborer to work. The same London Times, as all know, a violent anti-Irish paper, says that laborers from Ireland have inundated England; that there are at this time in Lancashire 106,000 of them; and that in Scotland and England there are at least one million Irish laborers, including their children. Would not these have worked in their own country could they have found employment?

3. As the system of tenantry can never develop the wealth and resources of any country, so, of course, it has not done it in Ireland. The cultivator will not make permanent improvements, when he knows that his rent will be raised on him the next year on that very account. For this reason, even the land which is cultivated yields far less than it would under another system.

4. Again, the rent which goes to the proprietors, their agents, and the middlemen, as they are technically called, amounts to about $65,000,000 per annum, $40,000,000 of which is sent off annually to absentee landlords, never to return to benefit the country in any form. This immense sum is an entire draught from the labor of the country, and must inevitably deplete any country almost to fainting.

5. Once more; the Church, as established "by the present order of things." Out of a population of 8,000,000, perhaps there is not even 600,000 who feel any interest in it, and scarcely any of this small portion belong to the producing class. Yet the labor of the country is obliged to support this Church in the enormous sum of about $35,000,000 per annum. And according to an uncontradicted speech in Parliament, the "present order of things" forces, at the point of the bayonet, a nominal but legal parish to pay to the legal but nominal rector from $3,000 to $20,000 for religious services, when in fact there has not been a sermon or a rector in some such parish for twenty-five years.

Here then is about $100,000,000 to be raised by the labor of Ireland; for all property, in every country, is the fruit of labor. And the more that is taken from the laborer, the less he must have on which to live. And the present order of things takes to the starving point. It is impious, and insulting to Heaven, to say that there has been a famine in Ireland; for in the very year in which we were hurrying vessels with provisions to her, she sent off to England the produce of her own soil, and the labor, in many instances, of the very hands that afterwards died of starvation, more than $25,000,000 worth of good and wholesome provisions. Ten bushels she sent to others for the one which she received. If a farm raise fifteen tons of hay, and some one carry off twelve tons of it, and the cattle starve and die, did they come to their death by a famine inflicted by the providence of God, or by the covetousness of the "present order of things?"

In conclusion, let the above state of things be fastened by the sword and bayonet on the fairest part of New England, and in three or four generations there would be about as much squalor, beggary, and wretchedness among the descendants of the present sober, virtuous, and industrious inhabitants of Connecticut, as there has been in Ireland. The like cause would produce the same effect in every country.

WISCONSIN HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION ACT.

A BILL to exempt a Homestead from forced sale in certain cases.

The People of the State of Wisconsin, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. A Homestead, consisting of any quantity of land not exceeding forty acres, used for agricultural purposes, and the dwelling house thereon and its appurtenances, to be selected by the owner thereof, and not included in any recorded town plot, or city or village; or instead thereof, at the option of the owner, a quantity of land not exceeding in amount one-fourth of an acre, being within a recorded town plat, city, or village, and the dwelling-house thereon, and its appurtenances, owned and occupied by any resident of the State, shall not be subject to forced sale on execution, or any other final process from a Court, for any debt, or liability contracted after the first of January, in the year eighteen hundred and forty-nine.

§ 2. Such exemption shall not extend to any mechanic's and laborer's lien, or any mortgage thereon lawfully obtained; but such mortgage or other alienation of such land by the owner thereof, if a married man, shall not be valid without the signature of the wife to the same.

§ 3. Whenever levy shall be made upon the lands or tenements of a householder, whose homestead has not been selected and set apart by metes and bounds, such householder may notify the officer at the time of making such levy of what he regards as his homestead, with a description thereof, within the limits above prescribed, and the remainder alone shall be subject to sale under such levy.

§ 4. If the plaintiff in execution shall be dissatisfied with the quantity of land selected and set apart as aforesaid, the officer making the levy shall cause the same to be surveyed, beginning at a point to be designated by the owner, and set off in a compact form, including the dwelling-house and its appurtenances; the amount specified in the first section of this Act, and the expenses of said survey, shall be chargeable on the execution and collected therefrom.

§ 5. After the survey shall have been made, the officer making the levy may sell the property levied upon, and not included in the set-off, in the same manner as provided in other cases for the sale of real estate on execution; and in giving a deed of the same he may describe it according to his original levy, excepting therefrom, by metes and bounds, according to the certificates of survey, the quantity set off as aforesaid.

§ 6. Any person owning and occupying any house on land not his own, of which land he shall be in rightful possession by lease or authority, and claiming such house as his homestead, shall be entitled to the exemption aforesaid.

§ 7. Nothing in this Act shall be considered as exempting any real estate from taxation or sale for taxation.

NEW INVENTIONS.

From the Farmer and Mechanic.

PATENT AIR-SEAT SADDLE.—At the recent exhibition of the Agricultural Society of York, (Eng.,) Mr. Taylor, of Banbury, Oxfordshire, exhibited beautiful specimens of improved harness, among which was a patent inflated air-saddle, for riding, with a moveable pannel, invented, improved, and manufactured by the exhibitor. The patent air-saddle is an excellent article for ladies' and gentlemen's riding; and to the invalid it will be invaluable, as the elasticity prevents the shaking which is frequently occasioned by the rough action of the horse, and is by experienced riders allowed to be the easiest ever invented, both to horse and rider; and which does not, as is suggested by many persons, act as a spring saddle, or tend to shift the rider from his seat. A hard or soft seat may be used as required.

SHINGLE SHAVING MACHINE.—Mr. S. Brewer, of Mount Henry, Montgomery Co., Tenn., has obtained a patent for a new and improved machine for shaving shingles.

The machine shaves both sides of the shingles at every stroke of the pitman, giving the proper slope, and throwing the shingles clear of the machine. It is simple in its construction; not liable to get out of order; may be tended by a single hand; is a light draught for a horse or mule, but may be worked by any power; and may be easily moved from place to place and set up, with little loss of time. The shingles made on the machine are of uniform thickness, and of the very best quality, and may be made of any timber of which shingles are usually made by hand.

NEW LAST MACHINE.—We learn from the Artizan, that Mr. Abner Land, of Killingworth, Conn., has invented a new and useful improvement on a machine for turning lasts and other irregular shapes on wood, &c. The cutter moves on the principle of the slide-lathe, and the wood to be turned revolves on spindles, set, as it were, on the periphery of a drum. Twenty to thirty lasts can be turned out at one operation without changing the spindles.

SAWING IRREGULAR SHAPES.—Mr. Thomas C. Merrill, of Newbury, Mass., has very recently secured a patent for a new and useful improvement in machinery, for sawing irregular shapes in timber, &c. He uses a circulr revolving frame in combination, and operating together with a reciprocating moveable saw-frame; and in combination, with the latter he uses parallel feed rollers, having a horizontal motion. These combinations along with two vertical parallel frames, he claims "for the purpose of sawing any material at variable inclinations to the horizon and in irregular lines across it during the up and down movements of the saw."

NEGROES vs. HORSES.

The following, says the Boston Reflector & Watchman, has been communicated to one of the pastors of Boston, by a son residing in Illinois, and may be relied on as veritable:—"To illustrate the difficulty of getting a slave back into bondage, let me give you a specimen of the jurisprudence of our country, which occurred yesterday at our county seat, (Woodstock.) Two white men appeared in town, having in custody two 'gentlemen of color,' whom they had taken in Wisconsin as their property—escaped from Missouri. These were brought before a magistrate in Woodstock, and claimed as their slaves. The Court decided that it had no jurisdiction in the case, as the negroes were illegally taken by plaintiffs out of the State, whereupon the prisoners were discharged. At the instance of the white men, the men of color were then taken up for stealing two horses when they left Missouri, from plaintiffs. Defendants acknowledged having stolen the horses, alledging that they were Indian horses, not belonging to plaintiffs. A long debate here arose between the learned counsel, whether—all being property—the negroes stole the horses, or, the horses carried off, and consequently stole, the negroes. The prisoners were again discharged, and went their way rejoicing in the blessings of liberty. But the end was not yet. A suit was immediately instituted against plaintiffs, on behalf of the people of the State, for kidnapping, and the Court held them to bail in the sum of $500, which not being able to obtain, they were obliged to pay the amount, and then left. The horses, I understand, are to be tried to-morrow, for stealing the negroes."

ITALIAN MODE OF COOKING MAIZE.

While journeying in Italy, some years ago, I was delighted with the remarkable mode in which the polentia or Indian meal is prepared in that country. I think, with the recent correspondet to the London Gardener's Chronicle, that the only fault of the Italian mode is, that one is apt to eat too much, as he says, "I am ashamed to say it has been my case at the Hotel de la Couronne, at Brides, near Moutiers. The landlord is renowned for his culinary skill, but could he only make, or had he never made any other dish than Timballe de Polenta a la Savoyarde, that alone should render him famous. Take polenta, (Indian meal,) perfectly dry and fresh, moistened with boiling water, and perfectly mixed by stirring with a wooden spoon until the mass is reduced to a thoroughly smooth paste, of consistence to admit boiling. Keep it just below a boiling temperature until by tasting you find it to be perfectly homogeneous; about ten minutes suffice; stir the whole time. Remove it from the fire and add as much fresh butter, strong brown gravy, grated Parmesan cheese, and as much garlic as suits your taste; grated ham is an excellent adjunct. Simmer ten minutes, stirring the whole time; pour the whole into a well-buttered mould, serve with brown gravy. I defy the world to produce the equal of this as a farinaceous dish." [Southern Planter.

FATTENING HORSES.

On his visit to the stud of the Pasha of Egypt, Col. E. Napier says—"Among other things I happened to mention the Indian system of fattening horses on chopped sheep's heads, and was not a little surprised when he said that he could the more readily credit it, as to his personal knowledge the Arabs of the Hedjaz often feed their horses on the dried flesh of the camel, as well as its milk, and that in some of the districts along the coast, when barley was scarce, even dried fish was used for them as an article of food."

The gluten of the plant and the muscular fibre of the animal are almost identical, and yet they are chemically different. We are indebted to Prof. Mulder, of Utrecht, for the observation, that if gluten, albumen, casein, fibrin, &c., be dissolved in caustic potash, and an acid be then added to the solution, a white matter is separated which from every one of these substances is the same—which exists in and forms from 95 to 99 per cent. of them all, and to which he has given the name of protein. In fact, these substances are all compounds of protein, with minute proportions of sulphur and phosphorus; it is upon these minute proportions of sulphur and phosphorus that the differences observed among these several substances as they exist in the animal and the vegetable in a considerable degree depend.

SIC TRANSIT GLORIA MUNDI.—The Washington correspondent of the N. Y. Observer states a fact that illustrates the fleeting character of human glory, more than any thing that has lately come under our notice. It is this. When Wirt died at the national metropolis, in the prime of his powers, and zenith of his popularity, his political friends solicited of the relatives of the deceased the privilege of retaining the body in the receiving tomb, until they could erect a suitable marble monument. The request was granted. But perhaps some who talked most in fact of the enterprise were not equally forward in contributing toward it. At any rate, the body was left in the public tomb, despite many notices from the sexton, until the period limiting the time of such deposites, as established by the law, had expired. Shortly before this period the gentleman who had been most prominent in the measure, died; and the sexton removed and interred the remains of Wirt; but as he himself soon after died or disappeared, no one can point out the spot where the dust of the talented, Christian statesman reposes. He has, indeed, in the hearts of thousands of his countrymen, a monument more enduring than brass or marble, but his history affords one instance more of the neglect that is apt to follow the services of the worthiest public servants.

A GOOD ONE.—A short time since a large number of distinguished persons assembled at Middletown, Conn., to participate in the commencement ceremonies of the Wesleyan University. Among the rest, Gov. Bissel was expected, and elegant rooms were provided for him at the largest and best hotel in the place. At length his Excellency the Governor arrived. He is a plain, diminutive-looking man, though of strong masculine mind and great powers of oratory. He went to the hotel where quarters had been assigned him, and entered his name; but there happened to be no body in who knew him, and he was not suspected of being any thing more than an every-day man from the country. At length he asked for a room and a bed. He was told that every room in the house was occupied, and that the best thing they could do for him was to make him a temporary bed on the floor. To this he did not object, and bivouacked for the night on a blanket spread over the bare carpet. The mortification of the landlord may be imagined when he found out, on the next day, that the stately rooms prepared for his Excellency were unoccupied and waiting, while the Governor himself had been obliged to take quarters on the floor.

DEVONSHIRE BUTTER.—The Gardener's Chronicle says that the way excellent Devonshire butter is made, is as follows:—Scald your cream in a zinc pan, over a charcoal fire, but do not let it boil. When the cream is cold, say the next morning, take it off with the hand. Put the cream into a wide wooden bowl; stir it with the hand for ten or fifteen minutes, and the butter will be the same as out of a churn, and to be dealt with the same. A cow that will make one pound of butter per day, that is, seven pounds a week, if the cream is scalded, will make nine pounds in seven days. Great care must be taken not to let any dust rest upon the cream. Connoisseurs in butter making say that butter ought always to be churned in an apartment the temperature of which is between thirty and sixty degrees. At sixty degrees, butter is obtained in the largest quantity, and at fifty-two degrees, of the best quality. These facts are of high practical importance to those interested in dairy economy.

NIAGARA OUTDONE.—Among the cliffs of the Eastern Ghats, about midway between Bombay and Cape Comorin, rises the river Shirawati, which falls into the Arabian Sea. The bed of the river is one-fourth of a mile in direct breadth: but the end of the fall is elliptical, with a sweep of half a mile. This body of water rushes at first, for three hundred feet, over a slope at an angle of forty-five degrees, in a sheet of white foam, and is then precipitated to the depth of eight hundred and fifty more, into a black abyss, with a thundering noise. It has, therefore, a depth of eleven hundred and fifty feet! In the rainy season the river appears to be about thirty feet in depth at the fall; in the dry season it is lower, and is divided into three cascades of varied beauty and astonishing grandeur. Join our Fall of the Genesee to that of the Niagara, and then treble the two united, and we have the distance of the Shirawati cataract! While we allow to Niagara a vast superiority in bulk, yet in respect to distance of descent it is but a mountain rill compared with its Indian rival. Rochester Democrat.

GUTTA PERCHA.—The indefinite variety of purposes to which this comparatively new material can be applied, as we have before observed, is truly astonishing. Walking sticks, and riding whips, ornamental trays, and ink-stands, harness for horses, boots and shoes for men, women, and children, gas and water piping, fire-engine and pump buckets, ladies' and gentlemens' clogs, cords for fishing-lines, nets, &c., whip-thongs, dog-collars, driving straps for machinery without seam, thread for philosophical purposes, traveling cases, gig aprons, sheeting for carriages, cords for window blinds, sashes, &c; fine tubing for chemical purposes, ear trumpets, medallions and printing types, &c., are among the articles now composed of this material. Six patents have been taken out in relation to it. The term Gutta Percha is Malayan, Gutta meaning gum, and Percha the name of the tree from which it exudes.

Farmer & Mechanic.

COOL PROCEEDINGS.—During the hottest months, when the thermometer is often at the height of 120 degrees Farenheit, the oriental ladies wear a silken garment and slippers, but no stockings. At night, it is the custom to sleep on the terrace, at the top of the house, in the open air, the ladies, the men, the children, and the domestics, having each their separate terraces. Strange as it may sound, it is by no means an uncommon practice with the ladies in Bagdad, in the months of July and August, to steep their night clothes in cold water, which is slung up for this purpose, in skins, in order to keep it as cool as possible. Having done this, they put them on, wringing wet, and again retire to their beds of palm branches, to enjoy refreshing slumbers. Notwithstanding this practice, rheumatism is rarely heard of in that country.

An article in the London Court Journal says, a new summer bonnet has been adopted by the ladies of the Court as the greatest novelty of the season. It is called the Neapolitan Bonnet, and strange to say, it is the production of Brother Jonathan, over the water. Its weight is only two ounces, and its elasticity is such, that no bruises can derange its shape. But its greatest novelty consists in having an alabaster semi-transparency, which, by throwing a side light upon the features, gives them the indescribable softness and expression which the Italian ladies obtain by lighting up their rooms with lamps reflected through vases of oriental alabaster.

If men knew what felicity dwells in the cottage of the virtuous poor man, how sound he sleeps, how quiet his breast, how composed his mind, how free from care, how easy his position, how moist his mouth, how joyful his heart—they would never admire the noises, and diseases, the throng of passions, and the violence of unnatural appetites, that fill the houses of the luxurious and the heart of the ambitious.

Ole Bull, the celebrated Norwegian violinist, is, an English paper says, now working as a journeyman in the manufactory of M. Vuillaume, a Parisian musical instrument maker, in the hope of being enabled to make a violin that shall equal the tones of those made by the celebrated Stradivarius, of Cremona, and for this purpose he has brought from Norway wood more than two hundred years old.

The Paris theatres have been re-opened, the government, which is bankrupt itself, voting nearly seven hundred thousand francs to keep those places of public amusement in operation. It probably thinks that if the theatres are open the people will have some place of resort other than the club rooms and will not be plotting mischief.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

BOARD OF INSTRTCTION.

W. C. KENYON, A. M., } Principals.
IRA SAYLES, A. M., }

Assisted by nine able and experienced Teachers, five in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past ten years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to also continue to merit a share of public patronage

Extensive buildings are now erected for the accommodation of students, and for Recitation and Lecture Rooms, &c. They occupy an eligible position, and are finished in the best style of modern architecture; and the different apartments are heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical

Ladies and Gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board and rooms can also be had in private families, if particularly desired.

Each room for those who board in the Hall is furnished with a bed and bedding, a table, two chairs, and a pail.

The plan of instruction adopted in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the student, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The Health, the Manners, and the Morals of our Students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

REGULATIONS.

1. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.
2. Punctuality in attending all regular Academic exercises will be required.
3. The use of Tobacco, for chewing or smoking, will not be allowed either in or about the Academic buildings.
4. Playing at games of chance cannot be allowed.
5. Using profane language cannot be allowed.
6. The use of any kind of intoxicating drinks cannot be allowed, unless prescribed in case of sickness, by a regular physician.
7. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, cannot be permitted.
8. Gentlemen and ladies of the Institution will not be permitted to visit the rooms of the opposite sex, except in cases of imperious necessity, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.
9. Good order must be maintained at all times, and in all the rooms and halls of the Institution, and in all the intercourse of students with each other.
10. All students are required to retire regularly at the ringing of the bell designated for that purpose, as occasion may require; and to rise at the ringing of the morning bell, also designated.
11. Any room, occupied by students, will, at all times, be subject to the visitation of the Teachers of the Institution, who are required to see that the regulations are complied with.
12. Students will be required to keep their own rooms in good order, and to pay all unnecessary damages, either of rooms or of furniture furnished with the rooms.

REGULAR ACADEMIC EXERCISES.

The regular exercises, at which all the students will be required to attend, unless specially excused, are, Chapel exercises each morning during the term; Recitations, from two to four, five days each week, from Monday morning till Friday evening. Compositions and Declamations, one-half day, once in two weeks, Literary, Scientific, and Moral Lectures by the Principals. Public Worship, once in each week, either on Saturday or Sunday, according as the students may be in the habit of keeping the Sabbath, either on the seventh or first day of the week.

GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the students will be in the hands of the Principals, and will be strictly and steadily exercised, and at the same time, strictly parental. The object of our academic government being to secure the greatest possible amount of physical, intellectual, and moral good to the students themselves, regularity and order of exercises, and good and wholesome citizens to society. No unwarrantable means will be made use of to enforce the observance of the above regulations; yet our constant endeavor will be, to make the means resorted to as effective as human means may be.

Parents who place their children in this Institution, and all students who are sufficiently old to understand the necessity of order, cannot be too well assured that the foregoing regulations form the most essential part of the contract between them and us; and that whatever student wantonly violates them, and shows himself incorrigibly determined on pursuing his waywardness, will be expelled from the privileges of the Institution, and will not be permitted to re-enter it again, without special proof of reformation. Nor will an expelled student have any deduction made from full term charges.

Farther, parents are requested not to place money for expenses, in the hands of students who are not old enough to use money with discretion and economy. Either of the Principals, or the Book-keeper of the Institution, will act as fiscal guardian of such students without charge.

ADMISSION.

Candidates for admission as students, must present testimonials of good moral character, or be known to possess such a character, and must be willing to comply unreservedly with the foregoing regulations; and no one will be permitted to receive instructions in any class, until all academic bills, for the term in prospect, be paid or satisfactorily arranged.

ACADEMIC TERMS.

The Academic Year for 1848–9 consists of three terms, as follows:

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1848, and ending Thursday, November 23, 1848.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, December 5, 1848, and ending Thursday, March 15, 1849.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, April 3, 1849, and ending July 12, 1849.

As the plan of instruction in this Institution, laid out for each class, will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue through the term, and accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the terms.

N. B. Students who are expecting to teach during the winter or summer, will specify such intention on entering in the beginning of the fall or spring term; and, for the special accommodation of such, a day will be set apart at first, on which they can leave, if they wish; and they will not be permitted to leave on any other day, nor will any other than teachers be permitted to leave on the day specified.

Farther, it is of the utmost importance that the student be present at the day of the opening of the term, as on that and the succeeding day, the students entering are examined and classified.

It is also suggested to parents who patronize this Institution from the distance of a few miles around, that students should go home only once during the term, as every absence from classes is always attended with disadvantages to the student. This is a suggestion, and not imperative. But to meet this suggestion, the exercise of the school will close at noon on the seventh Friday in each term, and open again on the afternoon of Monday following.

THE JUDGES JUDGED—NO. 5.

ERRONEOUS POSITIONS.

Judge Bell says, "All agree that to the well-being of society periods of rest are absolutely necessary." To our mind, the "Opinion" contains no more gratuitous or illogical position. It is one of those spurious sentiments sometimes extensively current in society, solely from the effrontery with which they are passed from one to another. It owes all its plausibility to the practice of confounding things dissimilar. The following thesis is perfectly demonstrable, and the proofs too obvious to need specification: 'All agree that to the well-being of mankind periods of rest are absolutely necessary.' It is obvious, that the terms mankind and society are capable of very different significations, and that they are sometimes so used as to have no other similarity than that both signify human beings. When the term mankind is used as above, it simply means that to the well-being of human nature periods of rest are absolutely necessary. But when the term society is used, it signifies a body politic—an organized community. Then the position of the Judge is quite unfounded. Society as a whole never rests; it is in perpetual motion; it has periods of relaxation, but night and day, work-days and Sundays, the year through, business of various kinds is always in progress. "All things are full of labor; man cannot utter it." To accommodate themselves to this ceaseless round of labor in society, there is a systematic exchange of operation so as to secure to humanity those periods of rest necessary to the well-being of each person. Mutual accommodation and protection is all that is required to secure to the whole mass of community all the advantages to be derived from stated periods of rest. A million of Papists, amid twenty millions of Protestants, regularly observe their religious festivals without interruption or material inconvenience, while the twenty millions of Protestants are in the full pursuit of their "worldly employment and business," although there is no special legislation for their particular case. There are probably seventy-five thousand persons in this nation whose stated periods of rest regularly return with every seventh day of the week, and who observe it while the mass of the community beside is in the full clangor of worldly employment and business. No complaint of interruption thereby has ever been made to the government from these seventy-five thousand Sabbath-keepers; none for injury or inconvenience on account of the masses observing a different day; no interruption has ever been offered from them to the masses in their worldly employments or business on the seventh day. Why should the masses complain of these few? Why not let them go on undisturbed in the peaceable observance of their own sense of duty on the first day of the week? We challenge state authorities and every truthful citizen to show that the well-being of civil society has ever been injured by our worldly employments or business on the first day of the week. All the motives of our persecutors are founded on malevolence or sectarianism; and, designed or not designed—we say not which—the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has lent its high sanction to this evil-doing against "a portion of its own citizens, belonging to a respectable Christian sect."

It is admitted that "there are expressions used in the statute that justify the conclusion, that it was a motive with the law-makers to prohibit the profanation of a day regarded by them as sacred." But to say this is to say nothing of the constitutionality of the Act, unless in this the religious conscience of others has been offended, and their rights invaded. These last, and only saving conditions, the Court has decided never can be admitted as having taken place. If this is not to "turn aside the needy from judgment, and to take away the right from the poor," we ask what would be doing so? One would have supposed, after the Judge had decided that the Sunday enactment is but a civil regulation, he had repudiated the Puritan notion of its being the Christian Sabbath, and consequently that he would have been content to have left the advocates of that idea to defend the Act of the Legislature in so enforcing it. But no; though no Puritan himself, the Judge would not have us think that he is opposed to the Puritan notion of the right of the magistrates to enforce the institutions of religion in communities where they have the power. The idea of a civil rest day seems to be derived from their principle of combining civil and religious institutions into one code. Hence his "Opinion" appears confused. He seems to have the high-church notion of the legislative right, as Whately expresses it, to "enact from time to time, to alter, to abrogate, or to restore, regulations respecting matters of detail, not expressly determined in Scripture, but which must be determined in some way or other, with a view to the good order of religious communities." Among high-churchmen, this is one of the prerogatives of the lords temporal and spiritual; among the Puritans, the right of governments, framed with a mixture of general Christianity, is, to enforce by civil enactments what the confession of faith says is divinely commanded, as the Christian Sabbath, for example. It was obviously to meet his Puritan friends on common ground, that the Judge, after calling it a civil regulation, decides that the Puritan motives of the Legislature, and the Puritan phraseology of the law, do not destroy "the constitutionality of the Act." Judge Coulter sees through this policy at once, and rightly judging that the high-church notion neutralizes the Puritan, puts in his caveat against it. "I do not recognize, (says he,) the right of the Legislature to make a day of secular cessation from labor independent of the Christian Sabbath." After all, when the effervescence is over, we are mistaken if the high-church carbon does not entirely neutralize the Puritan's tartar.

"We are prepared to estimate the reason why the statute should speak of it as the Lord's day, and denominate the infraction of its legalized rest a profanation. Yet this does not change the character of the enactment. It is still, essentially, but a civil regulation." It is a regulation, however, that does not allow Jews and seventh-day Christians "independent religious action,"—"it prevents the unrestrained expression of adverse belief,"—and gives "imposing effect and power to the religious opinion to which the State has lent its authority." "The error of the position is, that it confounds the reason of the prohibition with its actual effect, and thus mistakes the mere restraint of physical exertion for the fetters that clog the freedom of mind and conscience." Whatever were the reasons of the enactment, it works a cruel persecution of "a respectable Christian sect." The safeguards of our Constitutions are designed to prevent bad effects; reasons and theories are left to their own operations.

Having disposed of Judge Bell's "Opinion," we have a few remarks to make upon Judge Coulter's "views," given on the same occasion. He concurs cordially in the judgment of the Court, which sustains the Act of Assembly to restrain people from labor on the first day of the week, as constitutional. But it is upon widely different considerations from those put forth in the "Opinion." He frankly avows his conviction, that the intent of the law, and the object of the Legislature, are to guard the Christian Sabbath from profanation. He believes the Court ought to regard it as the statute declares it to be—the Lord's day; and this is the reason why it is constitutional. To call in question the Judge's views of the sabbatic institution, would be foreign to our purpose on the present occasion. It is on his views as a civilian, not as a theologian, that we have now to remark. Here we consider the Judge as radically in error. He says, "We are a Christian people and State." This a proposition true or false according to the sense in which it is intended. When spoken of the people of the U. S. in distinction from Pagan and Mohammedan nations, we assent to its truth, and exult in the fact as much as any other man; but when it is meant to designate the principles or object of our Government, we wholly and unhesitatingly deny it to be true. There is not a clause in the Declaration of Independence, or in the Federal or State Constitutions, on which such a proposition can be fairly rested. There is not such a sentence in the Federalist—a series of essays written to define and show the objects of the Federal Constitution. Our reading of the commentaries on the subject is limited, but we presume there is not in them a single passage that can be so construed. We know not of an author of repute, at home or abroad, that has commented upon the principles of our National or State Institutions, who has ever spoken of them as contemplating the establishment of even general Christianity. Nor, indeed, could it possibly be so; because it is prohibited by the first article of the Amendments to the Constitution. In the periodical literature of the times of the adoption of the Constitution, there is evidence enough that the subject was discussed; and the article before mentioned was without doubt designed to settle that question for all future time, or so long as the Constitution shall last. A distinguished foreigner, who visited our country for the purpose of becoming acquainted with our institutions, and whose volumes are likely to become text-books in schools, says, "In the United States religion exercises but little influence upon the laws, and upon the details of public opinion, but it directs the manners of the community, and by regulating domestic life, it regulates the State." We may add, this is the only legitimate influence of religion upon American society—the only one designed by its Divine Founder. Christ and his apostles specifically prohibit all use of the civil power for the purposes of his kingdom. They give precepts, however, that are applicable to all men, whether they are men in authority in civil society, or whether they are in the humbler stations of life. The great Master himself says, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." If the magistracy of Pennsylvania were as much concerned to obey this precept of general Christianity, as to enforce the Sunday law, there would be but little persecution of Jews or Seventh-day Baptists. The object and the spirit of our civil institutions, when rightly administered, is to protect the people in the enjoyment of their mutual rights; and that just design is frustrated in the case of Sabbath-keepers, by Courts disallowing them their conscientious interpretation of Jehovah's holy law, and by evading the just application of the organic laws of our country to their case—both as oppressive acts as the most arbitrary Courts of Europe ever perpetrated upon a suffering people.

Judge Coulter says, "General Christianity enters into the very frame of our social existence; it is a part of the common law of the State." He instances the principles of the Pilgrims of the Mayflower, and the legislation of the ancient Anglo-Saxon monarchs, in proof. But if we have any just ideas of the principles our Government, they are widely different. The Anglo-Saxon monarchs professed to reign by divine right, and considered themselves as a sort of regal vicegerents of God; and in that character they ruled both the world and the church. They could, therefore, of right, insist upon the observance of Sunday, or, as it was called, the Dominical Day. The Pilgrims of the Mayflower set up a religious polity, and copied their penal code verbatim from the books of Moses. Their idea was to establish religion, and raise up a religious community. All their officers were required to be religious men. But our Government set out with declaring its authority derived solely from the people, and with one article in its organic law declaring that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." "No religious test can ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." Could any institutions be more dissimilar in their principles? Could the frames of social existence be more unlike? The first instrument by which the nation became a body politic, declares its former political bonds dissolved. Accordingly, every one of the colonies which adopted this instrument, proceeded to form their local governments in most respects as though they never had a previous existence. The people chose their representatives, who came together to adopt a new political organization. Where they adopted their former colonial laws, it was always with the proviso that so much of them as was incompatible with their new social state should be null and void. The Federal Constitution was framed "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessing of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity." This organic law is the supreme law of the land; all the State Constitutions and laws are to be made conformable to it. Alexander Hamilton (in the Federalist, p. 450,) says, "The Constitution ought to be the standard of construction for the laws, and whatever there is in evident opposition, the laws ought to give place to the Constitution." On page 461, he says, "The evident plan of the Convention is, that all causes of the specified classes, shall for weighty public reasons receive their original or final determination in the Courts of the Union." "The national and state systems are to be regarded as ONE WHOLE." It is obvious from this, that unless general Christianity enters into the frame of the United States, it cannot of right enter into the frames of the States. But suppose it does; what is general Christianity? Who shall point out its extent, and define its limits? Who shall say what are its observances, and how they shall be administered? Judge Coulter's position, if it were adopted and acted upon by our Governments, would plunge this nation into all the acrimonious contentions of England two centuries ago, to avoid which the first colonists left their native land. And this is its actual effect now in Pennsylvania, so far as the Seventh-day Baptists and that State are concerned. Shall it be carried out? We shall see whether the State of Pennsylvania or the national authorities are supreme. To say that "general Christianity is part of the common law of the State," is so indefinite a proposition, that it is difficult to find where it is tangible. The common law in different countries, and in the same country at different periods of its history, is variable, according to the revolutions which the country experiences. So far as we are informed, the common law in this country is expounded according to the rules which prevail in England upon the subject. This, however, is only a rule of the Courts, and no part of our organic law. In England there is a State establishment of religion. If any part of the common law is derived from or controlled by that, it is perfectly inapplicable here, where that arm of tyranny is especially prohibited.

When the Judge says, "The Sabbath of rest comes to us secured by the very organization of society and the social compact," does he speak of civil society or of Christian communities? If of Christian communities, we have no controversy with him; we have only to remark, that it was perfectly irrelevant to the question before the Court. But the impression the Judge's language makes, is, that the Sabbath is secured to us by the organization of the civil government. He enumerates a number of States as affording instances of legislation upon it, with which he joins the general Government. But the operation of the post-office laws shows that it never was so established by the general Government. We have before shown, that every form of religion was left by our organic laws to the voluntary choice of the people; and that no form of religion can rightly be established by law. The prepossessions of the people have led to its establishment by our State Governments, only where it was supposed not to conflict with the national laws. Not a State in the Union dare attempt to stop the United States mails on account of the Christian Sabbath; common law, or Acts of Assembly, notwithstanding. It only wants a sufficient number of united, consistent men, to press the rights of the Jews and seventh-day Christians, with respectful firmness and legal accuracy, and their ultimate success is as certain as the progress of the light from dawn to midday. "Like water that flows, and the air we breathe—when the bond and the free, the master and the apprentice, and all men, meet in equality at the Christian altar—our rights will come to us secured by the very organization of society, and the formation of the social compact."

"THE BODY OF CHRIST."—The London Christian Observer, a Church of England periodical, has the following sensible remarks upon this subject:—"We maintain that the true Body of Christ is the aggregate of his faithful followers, scattered throughout different communions, (not excluding the Roman,) and united by a spiritual bond of union with Christ their Head, united 'in Him,' though perhaps unwilling even to hold intercommunion with each other on earth. This want of intercommunion is the effect of infirmity and sin, and it no more prevents their spiritual unity in Christ as members of the same family, than the dissensions of brethren (by blood) take away their earthly relationship."

THESE THREE.

"God hath not given us a spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind." 2 Tim. 1: 7.

I would not be all body,
And I would not be all mind;
Yet 'tis hard to keep in order
Such opposites combined.
I would not be all mind,
Nor would I be all heart,
Yet they quarrel with each other,
And they cannot live apart.
I would not be all body, all mind, nor all heart,
Though they work not well together, yet they cannot live apart.

I would not be all faith,
Nor would I be all love,
Like a watch without a spring
The indexes to move.
I would not be all love,
And all hope I would not be,
Like a watch without a dial
To tell the hour to me.
All faith, or all hope, or all love I would not be,
Though we know that far the greatest, is love of these three.

Give me faith for this poor mind,
Give me love for this weak heart,
Give me hope for this dull body,
And, my friend! we'll make a start—
No more need to live apart,
If for peace thou art inclined,
There is three-fold grace to bless thee,
O! my body, heart, and mind.
Only believe, and there's a promise, 'who seek shall find,'
Even grace to keep thee blameless, thou body, heart, and mind!

A MISSIONARY'S FAREWELL.

The following touching lines were written by "Fanny Forrester," now Mrs. Judson, about the time of her last visit to the home of her childhood, to bid farewell to all its inmates previous to sailing for Burmah:—

"My heart is heavy with sorrow. The cup at my lips is very bitter. Heaven help me! White hairs are bending in submissive grief, and age-dimmed eyes are dimmer with tears. Young spirits have lost their joyousness, young lips forget to smile, and bounding hearts and bounding feet are stilled. Oh, the rending of ties, knitted at the first opening of the infant eye, and strengthened by numberless acts of love, is a sorrowful thing! To make the grave the only door to a meeting with those in whose bosoms we nestled, in whose hearts we trusted long before we knew how precious was such love and trust, brings with it an overpowering weight of solemnity. But a grave is yawning for each one of us; and is it much to choose whether we sever the tie that binds us here, to-day, or lie down on the morrow? Ah, the 'weaver's shuttle' is flying; the 'flower of the grass' is withering; the space is almost measured; the tale nearly told; the dark valley is close before us—tread we with care! My mother, we may neither of us close the other's darkened eyes, and fold the cold hands upon the bosom; we may neither of us watch the sod greening and withering above the other's ashes; but there are duties for us even more sacred than these. But a few steps, mother—difficult the path may be, but very bright—and then we put on the robe of immortality, and meet to part never more. And we shall not be apart even on earth. There is an electric chain passing from heart to heart through the throne of the Eternal; and we may keep its links all brightly burnished by the breath of prayer. Still pray for me, mother, as in days gone by. Thou bidst me go. The smile comes again to thy lip, and the light to thine eye, for thou hast pleasure in the sacrifice. Thy blessing! Farewell, my mother, and ye loved ones of the same hearth-stone!"

DR. FRANKLIN ON INFIDELITY.

The following letter was elicited by the circumstance of Paine, after having finished his "Age of Reason," sending the manuscript to Franklin, hoping to secure his recommendation of the work. How far this expectation was realized will be seen by the perusal of the annexed authentic and excellent letter:

DEAR SIR:—I have read your manuscript with some attention. By the argument it contains against a particular Providence, you strike at the foundation of all religion. For without the belief of a Providence that takes cognizance of, guards and guides, and may favor particular persons, there is no motive to worship a Deity, to fear its displeasure, or to pray for its protection. I will not enter into any discussion of your principles, though you seem to desire it. At present I shall only give you my opinion; and though your reasonings are subtle, and may prevail with your readers, you will not succeed so as to change the general sentiments of mankind upon that subject; and the consequence of printing this piece will be, a great deal of odium drawn upon yourself, mischief to you, and no benefit to others. He that spits against the wind, spits in his own face. But were you to succeed, do you imagine any good will be done by it? You yourself may find it easy to live a virtuous life without the assistance afforded by religion; you having a clear perception of the advantages and the disadvantages of vice, possessing a strength of resolution sufficient to enable you to resist common temptation. But think how great a portion of mankind consists of ignorant men and women, and of inexperienced youth of both sexes, who have need of the notions of religion to restrain them from vice, support their virtue, and retain them in the practice of it till it becomes habitual, which is the great point of its security. And perhaps you are indebted to her originally, that is, to your religious education, for the habits of virtue upon which you now justly value yourself. You might easily display your excellent talents of reasoning upon a less hazardous subject, and thereby obtain a rank with our most distinguished authors. For among us it is not necessary, as among the Hottentots, that a youth, to be raised into the company of men, should prove his manhood by beating his mother. I would advise you, therefore, not to attempt unchaining the tiger, but to burn this piece before it is seen by any other person, whereby you will save yourself a great deal of mortification from the enemies it may raise against you, and perhaps a good deal of regret and repentance. If men are so wicked with religion, what would they be without it? I intend this letter itself as a proof of my friendship, and therefore add no profession of it, but subscribe simply, Yours,

B. FRANKLIN.

"LIFE IS SWEET."

"What," I asked a friend who had been on a delicious country excursion, "did you see that best pleased you?"

My friend has cultivated her love of moral, more than her perception of physical beauty, and I was not surprised when, after replying, with a smile, that she would tell me honestly, she went on to say:—

"My cousin took me to see a man who had been a clergyman, in the Methodist connection. He had suffered from a nervous rheumatism, and from a complication of diseases, aggravated by ignorant drugging. Every muscle in his body, excepting those which move his eyes and tongue, is paralyzed. His body has become as rigid as iron. His limbs have lost the human form. He has not been laid on a bed for seven years. He suffers acute pain. He has invented a chair which affords him some alleviation. His feelings are fresh and kindly, and his mind is unimpaired. He reads constantly. His book is fixed in a frame before him, and he manages to turn the leaves by an instrument which he moves with his tongue. He has an income of thirty dollars. This pittance, by the rigid economy of his wife, and some aid from kind rustic neighbors, brings the year round. His wife is the most gentle, patient, and devoted of loving nurses. She has never too much to do, to do all well; no wish or thought goes beyond the unvarying circle of her conjugal duty. Her love is as unbounded as his wants—her cheerfulness as sure as the rising of the sun. She has not for years slept two hours consecutively.

"I did not know which most to reverence, his patience or hers; and so I said to them. 'Ah,' said the good man, with a most serene smile, 'life is still sweet to me; how can it but be so with such a wife?'"

And surely life is sweet to her, who feels every hour of the day the truth of this gracious acknowledgment.

O, ye, who live amidst alternate sunshine and showers of plenty, to whom night brings sleep, and daylight freshness—ye murmurers and complainers, who fret in the harness of life till it galls you to the bone—who recoil at the lightest burden, and shrink from a passing cloud—consider the magnanimous sufferer my friend described, and learn the divine art that can distil sweetness from the bitterest cup!

THE THRICE DEAD.

A few days before the fall of Rouen, a city of France besieged by the Royalist army, and defended by the Protestants during the civil war produced by the reformation in France, a Protestant gentleman, named Francis Seville, was wounded in the face by the shot of an arquebus; and having fallen, apparently dead, was carried away and buried, with fifteen or sixteen others. At night his servant brought a horse for his master, at the rampart where, meeting the Count of Montgomery, he was informed that Seville was dead and buried. The groom, an old and faithful servant of the house, insisted upon having the body, to carry back to the relations of the dead officer, and Montgomery accordingly sent one of his suit to show him where the corpses had been interred. The groom immediately caused them to be taken out of their hasty graves, but finding them so disfigured with wounds, blood and clay, that it was impossible to recognize the features of any one, he replaced the bodies and cast the earth lightly over them again. While returning to his quarters, a feeling of remorse, at the careless manner in which he and his companions had re-interred the dead, took possession of him, and he returned to the spot to cover their remains more completely, lest the dogs should disturb their last resting place, in the night. The sun had by this time set, but in recovering one of the bodies, he saw, by the light of the moon, a diamond ring of peculiar form, on the hand, and instantly, by that token, recognized the corpse of his master. Being carried to an inn, Seville displayed some signs of life, and his faithful servant having called several surgeons, besought them to employ their skill upon his master. The number of wounded, however, did not allow them to occupy their time with a hopeless case, and they refused to give him any attention. The groom subsequently brought a physician, and one of Seville's friends, who saw that, though three days had by this time elapsed since that officer had been buried as dead, he still breathed; and, his teeth having been forced open, some wine and other nourishment was administered to him. While they were laboring earnestly to restore him to health, the town was stormed and taken; and a part of the enemy, searching the house of Seville's brother, whom they put to death without mercy, found the wounded man, and brutally threw him out of the window. He fell upon a dunghill, and some straw having been accidentally thrown over him, from a loft above, he remained three days in this unwholesome bed, where he was at length found, still living, by one of his cousins. He was then carried secretly out of the town, and under skillful treatment perfectly recovered. He lived for more than forty years after these events, and whenever called upon to sign his name, he wrote, "Francis Seville, thrice dead, thrice buried, and thrice brought to life by the grace of God."

MINISTERIAL SUPPORT.

The abstract right of a faithful minister of the gospel to an adequate support from the people for whose benefit he labors, is rarely disputed by intelligent and liberal-minded Christians. Still it is a notorious fact, that large numbers of preachers—and among them many whose faithfulness can not be questioned—are very inadequately supported, and consequently compelled either to abandon their work or to prosecute it amid serious embarrassments. Whence this delinquency in supplying what is acknowledged in the abstract to be the minister's right? Does it arise from the selfishness of the church, or from the prevalence of false notions in regard to the mode of getting at what is just? No doubt the former is the true cause of difficulty in some cases, but we believe the latter is the most common cause, and one to which there is most occasion for giving attention.

In many communities, ministers themselves have doubtless contributed largely to foster false notions upon this subject. They have perhaps settled in a society when it was young and feeble; and in view of its feebleness they have thought it to be duty to labor with their hands during the week, and preach on the Sabbath without charge, or with a very small compensation. This state of things has continued, it may be, until by natural increase the society has become large and wealthy. Meanwhile it is not impossible that the minister himself has been gradually accumlating, and has become what is commonly called "well off in the world." In such circumstances, he feels not the necessity of inculcating upon the minds of the people the duty of supporting the gospel in their midst; nay, he perhaps feels a sort of satisfaction in contemplating the fact that he has served them without charge, and takes occasion to declaim against preaching for money, as though it were a mortal sin to receive pay for ministerial services. Now let a faithful minister—one who consecrates his whole time to the work—be called to labor in such a society, and what a state of things does he find! Family prayer is a thing scarcely known; the social prayer meeting has been but thinly attended, or perhaps never established; the discipline of the church is of such a loose and general character that it can hardly be called discipline; the idea of contributing regularly for the promotion of religion at home and abroad, seems not to have been entertained; in short, he finds a society that is accustomed to meet and hear a sermon on the Sabbath, but has no plans or desires of a religious nature which extend much farther. He sees before him a great work to do—a work which will require his whole time, his best energies, and the sustaining grace of God. Yet the people have so long been accustomed to their free-and-easy way of doing things connected with the church, that the idea of paying a man enough to enable him to devote himself wholly to the work, startles them. Although they have had a sort of theory, that the minister ought to be supported, it is the work of years perhaps to bring them all to embody this theory in their practice. Let not these remarks be construed as condemning the class of self-supporting ministers to whom allusion has been made. No—they have their place, and may be very useful, often supplying congregations which would otherwise be destitute, and so helping on the good work. But when they assume, that the end for which the gospel ministry was instituted can be fully attained by men who devote themselves to their own business, instead of the interests of the church, six days out of seven, and then attempt to remove from the minds of the people a sense of obligation to support a ministry devoted wholly to the work, by presenting themselves as ministerial examples on the ground of preaching for nothing, they subvert the order which God has established. The church requires pastors as well as preachers, and without such labors as can justly be called pastoral, real and permanent prosperity can not reasonably be expected.

A misconception of what the Bible teaches in relation to ministerial support, has sometimes prevented people from doing what in the abstract they acknowledge to be right. But to us there seems no great obscurity about the subject in the Bible. We think the doctrine is plainly enough taught, that those who are devoted to the work of the ministry have a just claim upon those whom they serve for support. The necessary amount, or the mode of raising it, is of course left to be regulated according to circumstances. Do you ask for texts of Scripture to sustain our view? The first one in the New Testament that occurs to us, is the instruction of our Saviour to his disciples when they were about to engage in their ministerial work. He says to them, in Matt. 10: 10, "Provide no scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves, for the workman is worthy of his meat." The concluding sentence lays down a principle which covers the whole ground, and is applicable to all cases. If that principle were fully carried out, there would be no deficiency of ministerial support. In the ninth chapter of first Corinthians, the Apostle Paul argues the matter at large, and sets forth his conclusion in the following question, which we commend to the attention of those who are too scriptural to pay ministers for their work: "If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing that we shall reap your carnal things?" In Gal. 6: 6, he says, "Let him that is taught in the word communicate to him that teacheth in all good things." Such were the Apostle's precepts. His example was of a like nature. He tells us, or rather the Corinthians, that he "robbed other churches, taking wages of them, to do you a service," which implies that he not only took pay for preaching, but that he sometimes took more of churches than was absolutely necessary to pay for the amount of labor bestowed upon them. If these passages do not sustain our position, that the Bible teaches the duty of ministerial support, we know not what would sustain it. Believing that they do, we will stop short, lest any farther remarks of ours should weaken the force of the naked quotations.

THE JUDGES JUDGED—NO. 6.

OUR RIGHT TO CARRY THIS CASE TO THE UNITED STATES COURT IS CLEAR AND INDISPUTABLE.

Mr. Hamilton, on the Judicial Department of the Federal Constitution, says:—

"There is no position which depends on clearer principles, than that every act of a delegated authority, contrary to the tenor of the commission under which it is exercised, is void. No legislative act, therefore, contrary to the Constitution, can be valid. To deny this, would be to affirm that the deputy is greater than his principal; that the servant is above his master; that the representatives of the people are superior to the people themselves; that men acting by virtue of powers, may do not only what their powers do not authorize, but what they forbid." "The States, by the plan of the convention, are prohibited from doing a variety of things, some of which are incompatible with the interest of the Union, others with the principles of good government." "The interpretation of the laws is the proper and peculiar province of the courts. A constitution is, in fact, and must be regarded by the judges as a fuudamental law. It must therefore belong to them to ascertain its meaning, as well as the meaning of any particular act proceeding from the legislative body. If there should happen to be an irreconcilable variation between the two, that which has the superior obligation and validity ought of course to be preferred; in other words, the constitution ought to be preferred to the statute." "The courts of justice are to be considered as the bulwarks of a limited constitution against legislative encroachments." "This independence of the judges is equally requisite to guard the constitution and the rights of individuals from the effects of those ill-humors which the arts of designing men, or the influence of particular junctures, sometimes disseminate among the people themselves." "These sometimes extend no farther than to the injury of the private rights of particular classes of citizens, by unjust and partial laws." "If there are such things as political axioms, the propriety of the judicial power of a government being co-extensive with its legislative, may be ranked among the number. The mere necessity of uniformity in the interpretation of the national laws, decides the question. Thirteen independent courts of final jurisdiction over the same causes, arising upon the same laws, is a hydra in government, from which nothing but contradiction and confusion can proceed." "It may be esteemed the basis of the Union, that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States. And if it be a just principle, that every government ought to possess the means of executing its own provisions, by its own authority, it will follow, that in order to the inviolable maintainance of that equality of privileges and immunities to which the citizens of the Union will be entitled, the national judiciary ought to preside in all cases in which one State or its citizens is opposed to another State or its citizens. To secure the full effect of so fundamental a provision against all evasion and subterfuge, it is necessary that its construction should be committed to that tribunal which, having no local attachments, will be likely to be impartial between the different States and their citizens, and which, owing its official existence to the Union, will never be likely to feel any bias inauspicious to the principles on which it is founded." "The reasonableness of the agency of the national courts, in cases in which the State tribunals cannot be supposed to be impartial, speaks for itself. No man ought certainly to be a judge in his own cause, or in any cause in respect to which he has the least interest or bias."

We have transcribed these several declarations to show our own friends that the general Government is so framed as designedly to declare and protect the rights of individuals, as well as States; that the adjudication of these in the State courts is not final; they may be tried over again in the Federal Court, with the possibility of their being made void in case of their being proved infractions of "that equality of privileges and immunities to which the citizens of the Union are entitled." The cause of the Sabbatarians in Pennsylvania is not a hopeless one. Impartial men see and acknowledge that there is a sad inequality of privileges and immunities for Sabbath-keepers in Pennsylvania. Those brethren are citizens of the Union, born and nourished in it; they are entitled to all those natural and indefeasible rights which the Constitution was designed to protect. They have a right to pursue happiness by worldly business, or labor, or amusement, on the first day as on any other day; they have just as much right to the public roads for these objects on the first day of the week, as have the carriers of the United States mail. But of these rights on the first day of the week, the State of Pennsylvania has deprived them. If this is not a palpable infraction of our organic laws, what could be so? Suppose the Papists in the State of Louisiana should persuade the State Legislature to pass an act to empower magistrates to fine or imprison every citizen of the State who should refuse to close his shop or store, and suspend his worldly business and labor, on all the great festival days observed by that church; would it be submitted to? We imagine we hear the loud declamations against it reverberating through the land, from the St. John's river to the Rio Grande. But does the Constitution of the United States know any more of the Presbyterian religion than of the Roman Catholic? Not a whit. Roman Catholics have as much right to require legislation for their festivals, as Presbyterians have to require it for their Christian Sabbath. Yet the Presbyterians have had the address to procure the enactment of such laws in most of the States, and claim a right to make them perpetual. "We are a Christian people—a great Christian nation." It is time, then, that we ascertained, from the competent tribunal, whether we are a nation of Presbyterian Christians, or Roman Catholics, or what other form of the Christian religion it is that is recognized by our organic laws. Judge Coulter says, "All over the length and breadth of this great nation, the Christian Sabbath is recognized and guarded by the law as a day of sacred rest. Our National Congress recognizes it." The Christian Sabbath is peculiarly a Presbyterian institution; if it be thus established, the Presbyterian religion is so far established, and the Constitution violated! The Judge is in error respecting this thing. We challenge him to bring the law of this great nation that recognizes the Christian Sabbath, or that guards it as a day of sacred rest. Why, did the Judge never hear of a certain Christian denomination who put forth, at one time, all its power to induce Congress to make such a law? Did he never read the Report which the National Congress published in answer to their petitions? What says that Report? "We look in vain to that instrument for authority to say whether the first day, or seventh day, or whether any day has been made holy by the Almighty. . . . . . The Constitution regards the conscience of the Jew as sacred as that of the Christian; and gives no more authority to adopt a measure affecting the conscience of a solitary individual, than that of a whole community." The State authorities of Pennsylvania have judged otherwise, and despite the Constitution and these interpretations of it, have passed a law establishing a part of the Presbyterian religion, and made an infraction of it fineable, and subject to imprisonment. We should like to know who is the greatest, the State of Pennsylvania, or this great nation. Or, if the position of that State be sustained, whether the Presbyterian religion, or some other form, is to be the dominant one. Will our people unite hearts, hands, and agencies to carry this question to the Supreme Court of the nation? We sincerely deprecate all interference of the magistracy in matters of religion; but we believe all peaceably-disposed people are as much entitled to protection against the ill-humors of society, as they are against the depredations of lawless men. There is a vast difference between asking protection for our persons and estates against these things, and asking for power and authority to compel people to follow our religious notions. The latter authority, Paul expressly disclaims: "Them that are without (i. e. of the church) God judgeth." 1 Corinthians 5: 12, 13. But the same Apostle, when unlawfully bound, and threatened with scourging, claimed his privilege as a Roman citizen, and thereby obtained an exemption from punishment; and when, after repeated trials in the courts of Festus and Agrippa, he found that the clamor of the Jews always prevailed to prevent those fawning judges from doing him justice, he appealed unto Augustus Cæsar. It is with this object that the same Apostle says, "I exhort, therefore, that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty." Our privilege, as Christians, to avail ourselves of our civil rights, is so plainly recognized in the New Testament, and withal is so reasonable, that we hope no person among us will hesitate on that ground to aid in any lawful attempt to obtain redress for the wrongs Sabbath-keepers are enduring.

An abstruse Sermon.—Rev. Dr. Bushnell, of Hartford, Ct., preached a sermon during commencement week at New Haven, which has been the subject of considerable remark. A report of it, which appeared in the N. Y. Evangelist, is followed by this apologetic remark:—"We are painfully aware of the obscurity and inadequacy of this sketch; but the recondite nature of the themes discussed, as well as the abstruse method and language adopted by the preacher, rendered his discourse intelligible only to a few of his hearers, and make it impossible to reproduce his thoughts in this brief and disjointed manner."

Superannuated Ministers.—The Freewill Baptists are waking up to the duty of providing for their worn-out and superannuated ministers. The subject has been acted upon by the General Conference, and several of the yearly meetings. A writer in the Morning Star says:—"There can scarcely be a more moving appeal to Christian charity, than that preferred by an aged veteran of the cross, who has given to Zion the vigor of his youth, and the strength of manhood, and finds himself, when enfeebled age has crept on, without scrip or purse. Christian charity did we say? There is not a more honest and just debt contracted in the wide world?"

---

What avails it?—The editor of the Golden Rule, after alluding to a professor of religion who took the boat and started off on the Sabbath ("first day of the week," he means,) significantly inquires, "What avail Sabbath conventions, resolutions, speeches, prayers, and tears, even tears of blood, so long as God's professing people are reckless in this matter." A very proper question, as it seems to us, and one which we should be glad to see answered by some of those who attend the Sabbath conventions alluded to. They get together, not unfrequently, on the sixth day of the week—pass resolutions condemnatory of Sabbath-breaking, and referring for sanction to that commandment which says "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God"—and then, the very next day, the seventh day, the Sabbath, they start on their journeys home. What avail their conventions and resolutions when their actions are in such direct contradiction to them. The ungodly world, whom they are most anxious to influence, see the inconsistency of such a course, and often laugh at it. And as for God, he has no fellowship for such doings, as it is written, "In vain do ye worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men.

The Protestant Establishment in Ireland.—It is common to represent the unsettled state of things in Ireland as resulting from the preponderance of Roman Catholics in that country. But we do not believe any such representation. The existence there of a Protestant ESTABLISHED Church—a church supported by tithes wrung from those who do not sympathize with it—does vastly more than Popery to perpetuate disorder. Indeed, there is much reason to believe, that the Established Church, by justifying Popery in assuming the tone of a persecuted faith, is one of the main supports of the system. It misrepresents Protestantism, and creates in the Irish mind an almost hopeless aversion to sound Protestant doctrine. To us it seems the height of folly to think of benefiting a nation, much more converting it, through the influence of a church which, while it claims a missionary character, is supported by compulsory taxes. No doubt some of the Roman Catholic priests would like to have the revenues now enjoyed by the ministers of the Anglo-Irish church transferred to themselves, and encourage agitation in hope that such a result may some day be brought about. But whether this be true or not, we think they may justly insist that Catholics and Protestants shall be placed on a level so far as relates to support from the State.

The English Church and Government.—Several circumstances have recently occurred in England, which show that when the Church and the Government come into conflict, the former generally has to give way. The latest illustration of this is in the appointment of a new chaplain at Madeira. It seems that in all such cases the Foreign Secretary allows the residents to nominate the gentleman to be appointed; and it has hitherto been the custom, in order to ensure respectability in the party presented, for the latter to obtain a license from the bishop of London. Under this arrangement, a Mr. Lowe became chaplain at Madeira; he was chosen by the residents, appointed by the Foreign Secretary, and licensed by the Bishop. But Mr. Lowe proving a Puseyite, the congregation grew dissatisfied with him, and refused to vote him his salary. He was admonished, but in vain; and Lord Palmerston then called upon the residents to choose another chaplain, but the Bishop of London refused to revoke Mr. Lowe's license, and to issue another for his successor. Upon this, his Lordship, entertaining no doubt that "a license was an incident arising from and dependent upon the Secretary of State," dispensed with a fresh license; and his lordship farther informed the house, that henceforth he intended to dispense with licenses altogether. It will thus be seen, that Lord Palmerston is not a whit behind Lord John Russell in enforcing the rights of the Crown over the Church.

Reward for Catching a Methodist Preacher.—The following advertisement, copied from a Maryland paper, shows how they do things in a Slave State. Perhaps that Methodist preacher is now laboring among the runaways in Canada. If so, the Methodist Church to which he belonged will probably charge his market value as so much paid towards preaching the gospel to the heathen.

$250 Reward.—Ran away from the subscriber, living near Jefferson, Frederick County, Md., a negro man who calls himself Lloyd Smuthers, of about 22 years of age; he is about 5 feet 9 or 10 inches high, of a yellow complexion, and has a down, sly look, a round face, and a short nose. When spoken to he generally smiles before replying, and speaks smoothly. He had on when he left, a blue coat, white hat with a black scarf on it, and a pair of blue pants, and took no clothes with him except what he had on, that is known. He belongs to a Methodist Church, and PRETENDS TO BE A PREACHER. He took the stage from the other side of Middletown, on the 20th of Nov., and was seen afterwards in Hagerstown; he has a brother-in-law living near Harrisburg, named Ben. Russell.

The above reward will be given if taken out of the State, and secured so that I can get him, or $150 if taken within the State.

THE CHOCTAW INDIANS.

The following sketch of the condition and prospects of the Choctaw tribe of Indians, affords a happy illustration of the benefits arising from well-directed missionary effort. As a whole, the history of the aborigines of this country is exceedingly gloomy, and perhaps on this account an occasional bright spot is the more noteworthy. Immense good might be done for the much-abused race, if the money now paid to Indian agents who have no regard for their permanent improvement, were wisely expended in promoting civilization and Christianity among them. Government is slowly learning this, and the good fruit is beginning to appear. May it increase a thousand fold.

"The Chocktaw Nation of Indians now numbers, about 20,000 souls, the majority of whom emigrated to the westward of the State of Mississippi in 1840. The remainder have since been following, till now the whole tribe, except 3,000 or 4,000, are permanently located in the territory apportioned them by our Government, between the Red and Arkansas rivers, West of the State of Arkansas. Here, occupying 19,500 square miles of arable land, diversified in surface, and enjoying a salubrious climate, their numbers are increasing. Their government is thoroughly republican, being modeled after ours, and strictly local. Their constitution is of their own framing, and their laws of their own enactment and under them the penalties of their violation are enforced. This healthful state of affairs has been brought about mainly through the instrumentality of Northern Christians laboring among them, and chiefly connected with the American Board of Misions. For thirty years, Messrs. Kingsbury, Dwight, Byington, and Hotchkins, have been among them, and with such results that it is not extravagance to say that these Indians exceed the surrounding whites in morality, intelligence, and skill in the mechanical arts. The Choctaws are chiefly engaged in growing wool and the culture of cotton, which they manufacture into fabrics suitable for apparel. There are six missionary stations among them, having under their supervision ten large boarding schools and three academies, five of the former female, in each of which from 40 to 100 young persons are preparing for usefulness. Six are studying theology. These institutions are supported at an annual expense of $26,000, which is the product of the National School Fund, made up of the annuities received by the Nation from the United States, for nearly 20 years past, but shortly to be discontinued. The publication of a newspaper is now contemplated, and Mr. Dwight and Mr. Wright, one of the tribe, are at present in New York, for the purpose of translating the New Testament in the Choctaw language. Several of the standard works are already issued in that language. The Testament is advanced nearly to completion at the American Bible Society's house."

RECOGNIZING THE HOLY SPIRIT.

The agency of the Holy Spirit in the conversion of men is often underrated, if not entirely overlooked, by ministers of the gospel who claim to be orthodox in their sentiments. The consequences are generally disastrous, as might be expected from placing an improper estimate upon an important doctrine. The following paragraph upon the subject, written by Proff. Finney, who has long been noted as one of the most active men in using what are regarded by many as extreme measures for the promotion of religion, is pointed and timely. We bespeak for it a careful perusal:—

"I have thought that, at least in a great many instances, stress enough has not been laid upon the necessity of divine influence upon the hearts of Christians and of sinners. I am confident that I have sometimes erred in this respect myself. In order to rout sinners and backsliders from their self-justifying pleas and refuges, I have laid, and I doubt not others have laid, too much stress upon the natural ability of sinners, to the neglect of showing them the nature and extent of their dependence upon the grace of God and influence of his Spirit. This has grieved the Spirit of God. His work not being made sufficiently prominent, and not being able to get the glory to himself of his own work, he has withheld his influences. In the mean time multitudes have been greatly excited by the means used to promote an excitement, and have obtained hopes, without ever knowing the necessity of the presence and powerful agency of the Holy Ghost. It hardly need be said, that such hopes are better thrown away than kept. It were strange indeed, if one could lead a Christian life upon the foundation of an experience in which the Holy Ghost is not recognized as having any thing to do."

Moral Reform in England.—The British House of Lords has lately had under consideration a bill proposed by the Bishop of Oxford, a son of Wilberforce, aiming to secure some greater protection to females, and to dry up one of the sources of misery and crime in the metropolis. The bill was favorably entertained, but defeated by a majority of seven in a House of forty-nine peers. The difficulties involved in the protection proposed seem to, have been the great argument against passing the bill. If it were pheasants, instead of women, that demanded protection, Punch thinks a way to do it would have been devised.

Magnetic Telegraph Lawsuit.—An important trial has been in progress for several days past at Frankfort, Ky., in relation to magnetic telegraphs. Prof. Morse, Amos Kendall, and F. O. J. Smith contend for an exclusive monopoly of the principle of electro-magnetism in its application to telegraphing in the United States. This claim is resisted by H. O'Reilly, who maintains that a general principle, like electro-magnetism, can not possibly be made the subject of a patent. Eight days, up to September 2, had been consumed in reading depositions and examining various telegraphs. There is much yet to be done. The case is one of the most important ever tried in the United States.

General Intelligence.

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Niagara, which sailed from Liverpool on the 19th ult., arrived at New York on the evening of the 31st, with seven days later foreign news.

In Ireland, arrests continue to be made. Meagher, Leyne, and O'Donoghoe, have been arrested, or rather have given themselves up almost as unresistingly as did Smith O'Brien, and near the same spot. Several American sympathizers have also been arrested. O'Gorman, O'Donnell, and Doyle, it is positively asserted, have escaped to America. The trial of State Prisoners is progressing; O'Doherty has been acquitted, and John Martin convicted. The Catholic clergy, in great numbers, are petitioning the Queen "to take into merciful consideration the unfortunate situation of Wm. Smith O'Brien, and his deluded associates," and that no lives may be sacrificed on account of the recent disturbances.

In England, many chartists and sympathizers with the Irish have been arrested. Fourteen men were arrested at a public house in London, upon whom were found pistols, daggers, and other weapons. At Manchester, also, a batch was arrested, who have figured as leaders in the disturbances of the last three months. At Liverpool, several persons have been arrested, who were engaged in supplying arms to the Irish.

While these things have been going on, an enemy of even more appalling character than civil war has again made its appearance, in the form of the potato disease, in Ireland, also in England and Scotland. All the indications of destruction which discovered themselves in the autumn of 1845 are now re-appearing; and a luxuriant field of this essential esculent becomes in twenty-four hours a withered and blackened mass. A famine is thus threatened, which may carry off more than would have perished in the most desolating war.

From France, there is nothing of special importance. A review and sham-fight, which was to have taken place near Paris on the 13th, was postponed on account of the discovery of a plot to assassinate Gen. Cavaignac. It is said that the General has notified the Austrian Government, that any invasion of the Roman, Tuscan, or Piedmontese territory, will be regarded by France as a cause of war. Distress among the operative classes in Paris is said to be every day becoming more intense.

All doubt as to the fall of Milan is now at an end, Charles Albert having capitulated to the Austrians on the 6th of August. There are various rumors as to what he now intends to do, but the latest, and probably the most authentic, is, that he is going on with the war, and that the priests and dignitaries of the church are converting it into a holy war. Should mediation prove unsuccessful, the loss of life must be fearful.

An outbreak of a very serious nature has occurred at Bologna, in the Papal dominions. A company of Austrians, numbering some 2500 men, under some pretence, began to bombard the town, and finally set it on fire in several places. The people rose, and drove them off, after severe fighting, and the loss of many lives.

An Exploring Expedition to Africa.—An expedition is about to be fitted out by the Minister of Commerce, with the assistance of the Minister of Marine, to explore that portion of the eastern coast of Africa comprised between the bay of Lagoa and Cape Guardafui, for commercial purposes. The expedition will visit the ports of Lindy, Quiloa, Monfia, Zanzibar, and Pemba, dependencies of the Imaum of Muscat, opened to the French flag by the treaty of the 17th of November, 1844, and Inhambane, Sofala, Angola, Mozambique, and Gigo, Portuguese factories. M. Loarer, who has been recommended by the Chamber of Commerce of Nantes, is to command the expedition. He has orders to touch at Mayotte and Nassi Be, and to visit, if possible, the western coast of Madagascar. M. Bolvin, a botanist, has been appointed to examine and collect such natural produce as can be introduced into France. A delegate, appointed by the Chamber of Commerce of Nantes, has been supplied with patterns of the principal manufactures of France by the different Chambers of Commerce, in order that he may see what produce is best suited to those markets. A number of articles, such as watches, arms, books, and stuffs, have been provided for the commander of the expedition, which he is to offer as presents to the African chiefs.

College in Liberia.—Some time since, says the Journal of Commerce, Mr. Pinney, formerly Governor of Liberia, made some statements before a meeting in the Broadway Tabernacle, to the effect that 200 slaves had been manumitted, near Natchez, Miss., by the will of Capt. Ross; that the estate to which they belonged was valued at $400,000; and that all the property, real and personal, except the slaves, who were given their liberty, was destined first to defray the expenses of their passage to a settlement in Liberia, and the residue, estimated at $100,000, was to found a College on the same coast. The fact has since been communicated to him, that this ample property has been so wasted by protracted litigation, that the present cotton crop of the estate will scarcely pay the debts. Happily, while these hopes have proved delusive, a movement is now making which promises fair to repair the previous loss, and found on the shores of Africa an Institution which shall grow up with the people and mould their character.

Ohio in Africa.—We learn, from the Gazette, that a benevolent gentleman of Cincinnati offers to Mr. David Christy, Agent of the American Colonization Society, for Ohio, the sum of $2,000, for the purchase of a portion of the African coast, outside the present limits of Liberia, to be paid as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. His design is to offer the territory to the colored people of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, for their acceptance, upon which to establish a new State, in connection with the Republic of Liberia. The Agent at Washington, Rev. Wm. M'Lain, recommends that the purchase be made north-west of Liberia, so as to include the Gallinas, and those other "darkest dens of the slave trade." This purchase would embrace the coast between the Republic of Liberia and Sierra Leone, and forever banish the slave trade from that region.

Appearances at Niagara Falls.—The Rochester Democrat says: "Business at the Falls is becoming of more importance than heretofore. The unlimited water power is beginning to be made of service in various branches of manufacture. In less than one year, the number of mechanics has increased nearly two hundred. A magnificent hotel is soon to be commenced on the site now occupied by the superstructure of the one commenced over ten years since. It will front on two streets, being 330 feet on one, and 300 feet on the other. The dining-room is to be 150 by 50 feet, and 20 feet high; the parlors 64 by 46 feet, and the entrance hall 74 by 40 feet. Six or eight of the parlors will have from two to four bed-rooms and bathing-rooms attached. The tower will be 175 feet high, affording a fine view of the Falls, the surrounding scenery, and the country for many miles on both sides of the river. It is designed to accommodate 700 guests."

Important Decision.—We learn from the Boston Times, that an important case was decided in the Supreme Court at its recent sitting, in which an action was brought by J. D. Potter against G. E. Greeley, for a violation of a bond not to run a bread cart on his own account or for any other person except the plaintiff, over a certain route, for a specified length of time. Greeley plead, that though the bond was dated on a week day, it was in fact made and signed on the Lord's day, between sunrise and sunset; and, not being a work of necessity, charity, or mercy, was in contravention of the Lord's day Act, and consequently null and void. Chief Justice Shaw decided that the bond in this case was void, because made at a time when such an act could not be legally done, and gave judgment accordingly for the defendant.

The Millions of China.—The editor of the National Intelligencer, in a letter from France, states on the authority of Mr. Hedde, who visited Sou-Tchou, the principal silk market in the interior, that it is probably the largest city in the world, having a population of five millions within its walls, and ten millions within a radius of four leagues around. Situated on the great Imperial Canal, it has ten thousand bridges. Since 1718, when the missionaries quitted it, no individual, until Mr. Hedde succeeded, could get ingress. He did so, disguised as a Chinese trader.

SUMMARY.

An arrival from Rio Janeiro, says the Chronotype, brings the particulars of the loss of the ship Cassandra, of Providence. The fire was discovered about 4 o'clock in the morning in the lower hold, near the mainmast where four barrels of tar had been stored. Every effort made by the crew to save the ship was unavailing. The officers and crew, 23 in number, left in three boats. After experiencing distressing hardships, on the 10th day the boats landed on a beach near Conventas, in the province of St. Catharine's, Brazil.

Several cases of Yellow Fever having recently appeared at Staten Island, near the Quarantine, the authorities of New York have prohibited steamboats from landing or taking up passengers at the Quarantine or Stapleton Ferries. Up to Friday last there had been 34 cases of what is considered yellow fever, 12 of them malignant, of which 6 died.

There was a mob at Cincinnati on the night of August 23, with sad results. Two returned Mexican volunteers had been put in the jail on a charge of rape upon a small girl. A mob collected around, with a view to take them out and administer Lynch law. But the jail was protected by an armed constabulary force, who, after the mob had torn down the fence, fired upon them, killing four men outright, mortally wounding two others, and slightly wounding six or seven more.

The Buffalo Express tells a story of a knavish fellow being caught rumaging in the state-rooms of the steamer Michigan, on the lakes, and attempting to steal from the captain's trunk. Instead of delivering him over to justice, Capt. Stewart took the scoundrel to the hurricane deck, and in the presence of all his passengers, administered to him a wholesome chastisement, with a stout cane.

The pastor of the South Church in Ipswich, Mass., a short time since, called on a member of his society, Mrs. Kinsman, who was sick. This lady was 90 years old. In the room were a daughter aged 75, and a son aged 73. Mrs. Kinsman was married at the age of 15. She lived with her husband more than 70 years.

The shipments of copper this season by the Cliff Mining Company, will be at least 1,000 tons, which will yield at least $250,000, and enable the Company, after discharging its old debts, and paying for its land, to divide to its stockholders $180,000.

A Free Soil Convention was held at Baltimore on the 28th ult., at which the proceedings of the Convention at Buffalo were ratified, and an Electoral Ticket selected.

Lord Ashley has opened a poor man's library and reading room in one of the poorest parts of London, with courses of philosophical lectures, at a subscription of three half-pence per week.

Mr. Gerrit Smith, of Peterboro, N. Y., with his characteristic philanthropy, has given $500 for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire at Albany.

Moses B. Corwin is the whig candidate for Congress in the Champaign district of Ohio, and his son, John A. Corwin, is the loco foco candidate.

As the steamboat Antelope, on her way from New York to New Brunswick, on Saturday afternoon, was towing up a small boat containing four persons, and when near the dock at New Brunswick, the tow-line broke, leaving the boat in the swell of the steamboat, by which it was capsized and two of the persons drowned, one of them, Bergen Sillcocks, a respectable citizen of New Brunswick, the other a colored man named Samuel Boyce.

He has been tried, and hung.

MY MOTHER'S SMILE.

My mother's smile! how oft in sleep
It lies like sunshine on my heart,
Till when I wake, I wake to weep,
That aught so lovely should depart.

I sometimes sit and dream of fame,
But when I foolishly the while
Would link its glories to my name,
I meet a sad, reproving smile.

As o'er I number, one by one,
Through all my youth's misguided years,
The things which I should not have done,
How darkly dim that smile appears!

But when I hush my bosom's wrath,
Or smooth beneath the pilgrim's feet
The weary and uneven path—
O, then that smile is heavenly sweet!

When last I kissed my mother's brow,
She called me a poor orphan child,
And with me in my spirit now
Is the last smile she ever smiled.

THE SOLDIER'S WIFE AND WIDOW.

During a recent visit to the encampment of the Massachusetts Regiment at Brighton, we were an eye witness to a most distressing scene. While standing near the entrance to the apartment allotted to the officers, a young and well dressed female came with faltering steps to the door. Throwing aside a thick, black veil, a face of uncommon beauty was revealed, but it was evident that grief and anxiety had partially effaced the rosy hue of health from her cheeks, and care and watchfulness dimmed the lustre of her eyes. Her form was fragile, and a sad presentiment shook it as she reached the door, and drew forth a letter from her bosom.

'What is your wish, young woman?' inquired the officer who guarded the entrance, and who, at the same time gently prevented her from passing into the room.

'I wish to see one of the volunteers,' she replied.

'Is he an officer or a private?' asked the sentinel.

'He is a private,' answered the female.

'To what company does he belong?'

'I do not know.'

'What is his name?'

'It is Clarke,' replied the female, and at the same time impatiently pressed forward to the entrance of the door.

'I cannot let you pass; my orders are most strict,' continued the sentinel, 'but if you will wait, I will send for him at once.'

'Do send for him,' said the female with great enthusiasm; and for the first time hope seemed to possess her care-worn face with his blessed promise.

The sentinel called an attendant, and gave an order for Mr. Clark to be called.

'Clark—Clark, what company does he belong to?' asked the attendent.

'What company, young woman?' continued the sentinel.

'Of company I,' said the female, hesitating.

'Company I,' repeated the sentinel; 'there is no such company in the regiment; you must be mistaken.'

'I dare say I may be,' said she, and referring to a long and very closely written letter for a moment she replied, 'I was mistaken, it was company E.'

'Clark of company E,' ejaculated the attendant; 'Clark of company E, why, he is dead!'

We never wish to be present again at another such a scene. Hope, that had for a moment shone upon that poor female, had sunk forever from her sight. Had some strange commotion of nature swallowed up every living being, and every thing that the eye delighted to look upon and the heart to cherish, and left desolate that one poor creature, the transition could not be greater. It was not an extravagant sorrow, but a silent deep anguish that rent every human channel, and dissolved the great chain that connected the being with its kindred; all was gone. The doubts and hopes that had alternately struggled together, were at an end; the last struggle was over; and that female who a year ago looked forth upon the great vista of futurity for many happy years, was now alone—alone in the world. Hundreds of young and buoyant spirits were upon that camp ground, and while the air rang with many shouts for those who had returned home in safety to the bosoms of their friends and families, we saw that poor female mechanically thread her way through the noisy crowd, with tear-filled eyes and grief-choked utterance, and a crushed and broken heart.

A NIGHT WITH A DUELIST.

A duel was fought near the city of Washington under circumstances of peculiar atrocity. A distinguished individual challenged his relative, who was once his friend. The challenged party having the choice of weapons, named muskets, to be loaded with buckshot and slugs, and the distance ten paces; avowing at the same time his intention and desire that both parties should be destroyed. They fought. The challenger was killed on the spot; the murderer escaped unhurt!—Years afterwards, a gentleman was spending the winter in Charleston, South Carolina, and lodged at the same house with this unhappy man. He was requested by the duelist, one evening, to sleep in the same room with him, but he declined, as he was very well accommodated in his own. On his persisting in declining, the duelist confessed to him that he was afraid to sleep alone; and as a friend who usually occupied the room was absent, he would esteem it a great favor if the gentleman would pass the night with him. His kindness being thus demanded, he consented, and retired to rest in the room of this man of fashion and honor, who some years before had stained his hands in the blood of a kinsman. After long tossing on his unquiet pillow, and repeated half-stifled groans, that revealed the inward pangs of a murderer, he sank into slumber; and as he rolled from side to side, the name of his victim was often uttered, with broken words that discovered the keen remorse that preyed like fire on his conscience. Suddenly he would start up in his bed with the terrible impression that the avenger of blood was pursuing him; or hide himself under the covering as if he would escape the burning eye of an angry God, that gleamed in the darkness over him, like lightning from a thunder cloud! For him there was "no rest, day or night." Conscience, armed with terrors, lashed him unceasingly, and who could sleep? And this was not the restlessness of disease, the raving of a disordered intellect, nor the anguish of a maniac struggling in chains! It was a man of intelligence, education, health, and influence, given up to himself—not delivered over to the avenger of blood, to be tormented before his time; but left to the power of his own conscience, suffering only what every one may suffer who is abandoned of God!

A GENTLE REPROOF.

One day, as Zachariah Hodgson was going to his daily avocations after breakfast, he purchased a fine large codfish, and sent it home, with directions to his wife to have it cooked for dinner. As no particular mode was described of cooking, the good woman well knew that, whether she boiled it or made it into a chowder, her husband would scold her when he came home. But she resolved to please him for once, if possible, and therefore cooked portions of it in different ways. She also, with some little difficulty, procured an amphibious animal from a brook back of the house, and plumped into the pot. In due time her husband came home. Some covered dishes were placed on the table, and with a frowning, fault-finding look, the moody man commenced the conversation.

"Well, wife, did you get the fish I bought?"

"Yes, my dear."

"I should like to know how you have cooked it. I will bet anything you have spoiled it for my eating. [Takes off the cover.] I thought so. What in creation possessed you to fry it? I would as lief eat a boiled frog."

"Why, my dear, I thought you loved it best fried."

"You did n't think any such thing. You knew better; I never loved fried fish. Why did n't you boil some?"

"Dear, the last time we had fresh fish, you know I boiled it, and you said you liked it best fried. But I have boiled some."

So saying, she lifted a cover, and, lo! the shoulders of the cod, nicely boiled, were neatly deposited in a dish, a sight of which would have made an epicure rejoice, but which only added to the ill-nature of her husband.

"A pretty dish this!" exclaimed he. "Boiled fish? Chips and porridge! If you had not been one of the most stupid of womankind, you would have made it into a chowder."

His patient wife, with a smile, immediately placed a tureen before him, containing an excellent chowder!

"My dear," said she, "I was resolved to please you. There is your favorite dish."

"Favorite dish, indeed!" grumbled the discomfited husband; "I dare say it is an unpalatable, wishy-washy mess. I would rather have a boiled frog than the whole of it."

This was a common expression of his, and had been anticipated by his wife, who, as soon as the preference was expressed, uncovered a large dish near her husband, and there was a large BULL-FROG, of portentous dimensions, and pugnacious aspect, stretched out at full length! Zachriah sprung from his chair, not a little frightened at the unexpected apparition.

"My dear," said his wife, in a kind, entreating tone, "I hope you will at length be able to make a dinner."

NEW INVENTIONS.

From the Farmer & Mechanic.

A Mr. Blake, of Akron, Ohio, has discovered a mineral substance, which, when taken from the mine, exhibits the consistency of cold tallow, but on exposure to the atmosphere for a few days, turns to a hard slate or stone. It is already in use for roofing—about fifty houses have been covered with it in Rochester, N. Y., as we learn from the Genesee Farmer. The cost of it is small, 100 lbs. being sold for $3 or $4. It is ground to a powder after being dried, and is then mixed with linseed oil, and applied to the roof.

A lieutenant in the British navy has invented a "peril indicator," to show when steamers or other ships are running into shoal water. The apparatus consists of two bars which project ten feet below the keel of the vessel, and as soon as these bars touch the ground, they spring up on a level with the keel, and ring a bell, which warns the engineer that he must reverse the engines, and drive the ship astern.

A mode of manufacturing charcoal in France, is to fill all the interstices in a heap of wood to be charred, with dry powdered charcoal; then cover the whole mass with earth or sods, and burn it in the usual way. By this means, much of the access of air is prevented, and a saving of ten per cent. in volume, as well as weight of charcoal, will be gained over the ordinary modes.

A DISCOVERY BY ACCIDENT.

The chief discoveries in the arts have been made by accident, not from forethought or a deep knowledge of the principles in nature. It is related that the discovery of glass-making was effected by seeing the sand vitrified on which a fire had been kindled. The discovery of the manufacture of plate-glass is said to be accidental. Bloncourt relates, as the mode in which the casting of plate-glass was discovered, that a person who was melting some of this material in a crucible, accidentally spilt it, while fluid, upon the ground. The metal run under one of the large flag-stones wherewith the place was paved, which obliged the workman to take up the stone in order to recover the glass. He then found it in the form of a plate, such as could not be produced by the ordinary process of blowing. The man's attention being roused by this fact, he was unable to sleep, and, conceiving at once the superiority of this method for forming mirrors, he immediately commenced experimenting, and before the day appeared, had proved the practicability of the improvement, which the purest chance had placed within the sphere of his observation.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO PRINTERS IN OLD TIMES.—The Council of New York passed the following resolve on the 23d March, 1692, old style:

"It is resolved in Council, that if a Printer will come and settle in the city of New York for the printing of our Acts of Assembly and Public Papers, he shall be allowed the sum of forty pounds, current money of New York, per annum, for his salary, and have the benefit of his printing besides what serves to the public."

DELIRIUM TREMENS.—The following awful illustration of the effects of intemperance is copied from one of the papers in the city of Albany. The reading of it makes one's blood run cold:—

"A day or two ago we saw a woman raving with the delirium tremens. She was young, handsome, and a mother. An uncontrollable passion for intoxicating drinks soon made a hell of a once happy home, drove a kind-hearted husband to despair and death, and brought the wretched mother and her two young boys to the degradation of public shame and street beggary. Her ravings were terrible. She fancied herself a fiend in perdition, compelled by a superior power of darkness to thrust her children into fierce flames, and hold them there till their bodies were burnt to a crisp! Her description of what she saw in her madness, and of what she fancied she was obliged to do, were awful and indescribable. Occasionally the wretched being would fly to the farthest corner of the room, uttering piercing screams of agony, and pressing the palms of her hands over her eyes in a vain attempt to shut out the horrid spectacle presented to her distorted vision. Then, as if impelled by an irresistible power, she would rush forward, clutching wildly at what she thought were her children, and with loud outcries, plunged them again and again in the furnace of fire, mingling horrid curses and imprecations with the most touching and fervent prayers. This hallucination haunted the miserable creature long after she was rendered powerless by the restraints of the strait-jacket, and was succeeded by others, even more terrible in character, and too shocking for detail, which continued until death closed the scene."

NUTMEG TREE.—The nutmeg tree flourishes in Singapore, near the equator. It is raised from the nuts in nurseries, where it remains until the fifth year, when it puts forth its blossoms and shows its sex. It is then set out permanently. The trees are planted thirty feet apart, in diamond order—a male tree in the centre. They begin to bear in the eighth year, increasing for many years, and they pay a large profit. There is no nutmeg season. Every day of the year shows buds, blossoms, and fruit, in every stage of growth to maturity. The nutmeg is a large and beautiful tree, of a thick foliage and a rich green color. The ripe fruit is singularly brilliant. The shell is glossy black, and the mace it exposes when it bursts is of bright scarlet, making the tree one of the most beautiful objects of the vegetable world.

BUSINESS FIRST, THEN PLEASURE.—A man who is very rich now, was very poor when he was a boy. When asked how he got his riches, he replied, "My father taught me never to play till all my work for the day was finished, and never to spend money till I had earned it. If I had but half an hour's work to do in a day, I must do that the first thing, and in half an hour. After this was done, I was allowed to play; and I could then play with much more pleasure than if I had the thought of an unfinished task before my mind. I early formed the habit of doing everything in its time, and it soon became perfectly easy to do so. It is to this habit that I now owe my prosperity." Let every boy who reads this go and do likewise, and he will meet a similar reward.

THE GAMBLER AND HIS MOTHER.—Said a gambler, seated at the gaming table on board one of our steamboats, "My mother taught me never to spit on the carpet." I noticed he was faithful to fulfil the injunction, every time he had occasion to remove the filthy tobacco juice from his mouth. The mother, no doubt, from his infancy had impressed it indelibly upon his mind, never to violate this rule, and the young gambler remembered it, even now, when removed from her immediate influence. Had that same mother said to him in boyhood's days, "My son, never gamble," and impressed it as indelibly as the other, he doubtless would have said, if solicited to play the game of chance, "My mother taught me never to gamble," and thus he would have been saved from the ruin that now awaits him.

PERSONAL DEVOTION.—At the attack at Ratisbonne, in April, 1809, after an obstinate conflict, Marshal Lannes became at length master of the place. An officer of the major staff, though mortally wounded, hurried at the top of his horse's speed to the little mount, where Napoleon was waiting, surrounded by his officers, and leaping to the ground, advanced feebly toward him, deathly pale, and covered with blood.

"Sire," cried he in an exulting voice, "Ratisbonne is ours. Behold, our banners wave over the walls of the town. Sire, behold your eagles!"

"Sir, you are wounded!" interrupted the Emperor.

"No, sire!—I—I—am killed!" responded the heroic messenger. And pronouncing this speech he fell dead.

"JUST LIKE HIM."—A poor, pious negro woman being addressed by her teacher on the goodness of God, was asked whether she was not astonished at his mercy in giving his Son, and his condescension in giving that Son for her, she replied she was not. Supposing she was not sufficiently impressed with the subject, and defective in the fine feeling of gratitude, he continued to expatiate on the vastness and freedom of his love, giving additional emphasis to his language and coloring to his subject, closing again with the question, "What, are you not astonished at this?" "No, massa," was still the reply. Turning upon her with a degree of impatience, "And why are you not astonished?" he inquired "Why, massa, me no astonished, because it be just like him."

ANOTHER MISSIONARY FOR CHINA.—Rev. Henry Goodale, native of Massachusetts, but for the last four years a native of Kentucky, was appointed on the 31st of July, by the Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention, as a missionary to China. Mr. Goodale has just completed a course of study at Georgetown, Kentucky. He was a member of the Second Baptist Church in Louisville, Ky., and before entering college, labored one year as a colporteur of the American Tract Society, in Kentucky. His field will be Canton, and Providence permitting, he will sail about the 15th of September. So says the Christian Chronicle.

VARIETY.

Mr. David, cutler, of Leadenhall-street, London, has recently registered under the Utility Designs Act, a razor of highly improved configuration, which consists in giving a curvilinear form, lengthwise, to the edge of the blade, and leaving more room for obtaining a good purchase on it when shaving. The handle also is beveled within-side, to allow more space for the entry of the blade when shutting to—thus preventing the injury to its edge, that frequently occurs from catching on the sides of the handle.

Drawing fresh water from old ocean's bed is among the latest achievements of science. It has been acomplished at New Haven, by boring to a depth of forty feet, through the wharf, salt water and soil; and sinking an iron tube to that depth. Fresh water, pure and sweet, flows up through the tube so abundant that it can not be exhausted by two pumps.

A quarter of a century ago Lowell, Mass., was not known. It was then almost uninhabited. Now, it contains 35,000 inhabitants, 47 cotton and woollen mills, 11 1-2 millions of incorporated capital, 260,000 spindles, and 8,000 looms. There are from 10,000 to 15,000 girls employed in the mills. On every side new buildings are being erected, and improvement is the order of the day.

A decision relative to the slave trade was recently rendered by Judge Kane, of Philadelphia, in the case of Lovett vs. Lieut. Bispham. The Lieut had seized a vessel suspected of engaging in the slave trade, and the proprietors brought an action for damages. Decision rendered for the defendant, thus establishing the right of American cruisers to detain and search vessels suspected of being connected with the slave trade.

Dr. Andrews, President of the Inventors' Institute, at Perth Amboy, N. J., advertises that he has invented a car for the "navigation of the atmosphere," which, when constructed, will be one hundred feet long, forty wide, and thirty-two high. In order to raise the means to construct it, building lots near the Institute are offered for sale.

A Mr. Versepary of England has patented a method for manufacturing white lead in closed vessels, whence it is extracted and mixed with water. It cannot, consequently, be diffused in dust through the atmosphere of the workshop; the workman neither touches nor breaths it; the only contact which occurs, with some precaution, is to put it in and take it out of the stove.

In England all railways to which the act requiring cheap trains applies, are required to run one train daily, including Sundays, if they run any Sunday trains, carrying passengers at a fare not exceeding a penny a mile, at an average rate of speed not less than 12 miles an hour, including stoppages. The carriages are required to be provided with seats, and to be protected from the weather.

S. B. Stockwell, an artist, is engaged in transferring to canvas the principal features of the Mississippi, from the Falls of St. Anthony to the mouth. Sketch-book in hand, he has descended the whole distance. The scenery of the Upper Mississippi is beautiful, and no doubt when transferred by a master hand to the canvas, its pleasing effect will be increased. It will probably be completed during the fall, when it will be exhibited a short time before leaving for Europe.

An exchange tells a story of lightning-freaks, where an apple-tree in Helderberg was struck and split from top to bottom. A young man named Smith was leaning against the tree at the time, and slid into the cavity, when the tree closed and held him fast. Axes and crowbars were resorted to before the young man could be released.

Messrs. Crossett and Childs, of Baltimore, have exhibited the most simple, and it appears, useful machine for getting out barrel staves that has been seen. It gets out from 10,000 to 15,000 per day. It is supposed it will in a great measure supersede the usual methods of stave dressing now in use.

For the year ending 5th of January last, the whole amount of the public expenditure of Great Britain was $296,000,000. Of this large sum, $57,285,000 was expended in maintaining the army and navy upon a war footing in a period of profound peace. This exceeds the sum appropriated to the same object in 1835, by thirty-five millions of dollars.

We learn from the English papers, that a new white paint is made of oxide of antimony, (argentine flowers, as it used to be called by the old chemists.) It is an excellent body paint, superior to white lead, and much cheaper. Its color is more permanent, it is lighter and more subtile, and can be spread over a much larger surface.

India Rubber is coming into use upon some of the Eastern Railroads. For several miles, on the Stonington Road, it has been placed under the bearings of the rails, upon chairs and sleepers, and is said to work admirably, as a relief to all the finer parts of the machinery of the locomotive, and the friction of the cars. The Long Island Route has commenced using it.

A private in the Virginia Regiment of Volunteers, after his discharge, proceeded to the hotel where one of his late officers boarded, and deliberately cowhided him in presence of the whole company at the hotel.

Oregon is said to contain 218,536,230 acres; California and New Mexico contain 500,000 square miles. These and the other territories of the Union equal at least 1,600,000 miles or 260,000,000 square acres.

It is said that a Mr. William Vickery, an ingenious mechanic, has been employed for some time past in constructing a machine for mowing grass, &c.

There are 778 banks in the Union. Their capital is nearly $210,000,000. Circulation about $125,000,000. Specie about $50,000,000.

The Wheeling Gazette says that $180,000 have been expended in that city, during the last year, in steamboat building.

There are eighty-five John Smiths in New York city, and of these, thirty-five have no middle name to distinguish them.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

BOARD OF INSTRTCTION.

W. C. KENYON, A. M., } Principals.
IRA SAYLES, A. M., }

Assisted by nine able and experienced Teachers, five in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past ten years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to also continue to merit a share of public patronage

Extensive buildings are now erected for the accommodation of students, and for Recitation and Lecture Rooms, &c. They occupy an eligible position, and are finished in the best style of modern architecture; and the different apartments are heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical

Ladies and Gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will hoard in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board and rooms can also be had in private families, if particularly desired.

Each room for those who board in the Hall is furnished with a bed and bedding, a table, two chairs, and a pail.

The plan of instruction adopted in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the student, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The Health, the Manners, and the Morals of our Students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

REGULATIONS.

1. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.

2. Punctuality in attending all regular Academic exercises will be required.

3. The use of Tobacco, for chewing or smoking, will not be allowed either in or about the Academic buildings.

4. Playing at games of chance cannot be allowed.

5. Using profane language cannot be allowed.

6. The use of any kind of intoxicating drinks cannot be allowed, unless prescribed in case of sickness, by a regular physician.

7. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, cannot be permitted.

8. Gentlemen and ladies of the Institution will not be permitted to visit the rooms of the opposite sex, except in cases of imperious necessity, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.

9. Good order must be maintained at all times, and in all the rooms and halls of the Institution, and in all the intercourse of students with each other.

10. All students are required to retire regularly at the ringing of the bell designated for that purpose, as occasion may require; and to rise at the ringing of the morning bell, also designated.

11. Any room, occupied by students, will, at all times, be subject to the visitation of the Teachers of the Institution, who are required to see that the regulations are complied with.

12. Students will be required to keep their own rooms in good order, and to pay all unnecessary damages, either of rooms or of furniture furnished with the rooms.

REGULAR ACADEMIC EXERCISES.

The regular exercises, at which all the students will be required to attend, unless specially excused, are, Chapel exercises each morning during the term; Recitations, from two to four, five days each week, from Monday morning till Friday evening. Compositions and Declamations, one-half day, once in two weeks, Literary, Scientific, and Moral Lectures by the Principals. Public Worship, once in each week, either on Saturday or Sunday, according as the students may be in the habit of keeping the Sabbath, either on the seventh or first day of the week.

GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the students will be in the hands of the Principals, and will be strictly and steadily exercised, and at the same time, strictly parental. The object of our academic government being to secure the greatest possible amount of physical, intellectual, and moral good to the students themselves, regularity and order of exercises, and good and wholesome citizens to society. No unwarrantable means will be made use of to enforce the observance of the above regulations; yet our constant endeavor will be, to make the means resorted to as effective as humun means may be.

Parents who place their children in this Institution, and all students who are sufficiently old to understand the necessity of order, cannot be too well assured that the foregoing regulations form the most essential part of the contract between them and us; and that whatever student wantonly violates them, and shows himself incorrigibly determined on pursuing his waywardness, will be expelled from the privileges of the Institution, and will not be permitted to re-enter it again, without special proof of reformation. Nor will an expelled student have any deduction made from full term charges.

Farther, parents are requested not to place money for expenses, in the hands of students who are not old enough to use money with discretion and economy. Either of the Principals, or the Book-keeper of the Institution, will act as fiscal guardian of such students without charge.

ADMISSION.

Candidates for admission as students, must present testimonials of good moral character, or be known to possess such a character, and must be willing to comply unreservedly with the foregoing regulations; and no one will be permitted to receive instructions in any class, until all academic bills, for the term in prospect, be paid or satisfactorily arranged.

ACADEMIC TERMS.

The Academic Year for 1848-9 consists of three terms, as follows:

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1848, and ending Thursday, November 23, 1848.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, December 5, 1848, and ending Thursday, March 15, 1849.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, April 3, 1849, and ending July 12, 1849.

As the plan of instruction in this Institution, laid out for each class, will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue through the term, and accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the terms.

N. B. Students who are expecting to teach during the winter or summer, will specify such intention on entering in the beginning of the fall or spring term; and, for the special accommodation of such, a day will be set apart at first, on which they can leave, if they wish; and they will not be permitted to leave on any other day, nor will any other than teachers be permitted to leave on the day specified.

Farther, it is of the utmost importance that the student be present at the day of the opening of the term, as on that and the succeeding day, the students entering are examined and classified.

It is also suggested to parents who patronize this Institution from the distance of a few miles around, that students should go home only once during the term, as every absence from classes is always attended with disadvantages to the student. This is a suggestion, and not imperative. But to meet this suggestion, the exercise of the school will close at noon on the seventh Friday in each term, and open again on the afternoon of Monday following.

EXPENSES.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER OF BRO. WARDNER.

SHANGHAI, China, Feb. 20, 1848.

You may have felt disappointed at not receiving from us a more minute description of this place, with the character and customs of its inhabitants. It would have been otherwise, were it not that we supposed you had access to more competent sources of information. It appears by the Recorder, that you have had a general outline of the natural and national history of the country from Rev. Mr. Williams. Dr. Bridgeman, Editor of the China Repository, is now here, and has given a minute description of the most interesting characteristics of this place in that periodical, to which I suppose you have access, as I have seen some extracts from it in the Recorder. However, agreeable to your request, I will note a few particulars.

As respects the climate, no country can boast of one more delightful. There are two or three months of extreme hot weather in which the thermometer rises to over a hundred degrees in the shade. The cold is much more trying at the same degree of temperature, than in our native country, owing perhaps to the dampness of the air, as it proceeds from the sea. The lowest the thermometer has fallen during the present winter has been about twenty degrees. The seasons throughout are said to be about like those of Virginia, by individuals who have formerly lived in that State. The productions of the country are abundant, and of greater variety than are generally found in America, and some of the land is kept under cultivation during the whole year. The inhabitants are generally industrious, avaricious, deceitful, and theivish, though mild, friendly, and sociable. They show much respect for foreigners who treat them with civility. Instances have been rare in which we have been treated with the slightest rudeness, though their curiosity sometimes leads them to be somewhat annoying.

Education is held in high estimation among the Chinese and is that by which they are distinguished in rank and office. Their qualifications are tested through judges appointed by government, who select one essay from every hundred written upon some literary topic, and presented by aspirants for distinction, which is published, and a title of honor conferred on the writer, who is then regarded as a suitable candidate for promotion. Their love for books seems truly encouraging. More than once have I started with a bundle of tracts to distribute among the families of certain districts, but was invariably thronged the moment it was known, till every tract was gone. Our house is visited almost daily by applicants for books. Nor do these messengers appear to be entirely without effect. A few weeks since, a man who had chanced to meet with some of them, came a considerable distance to visit Dr. Medhurst, that he might learn more of the doctrine. Do not these things appear like the dawning of a better day? May God dispel the dark clouds which now enshroud their minds, that the day-star of hope may dawn upon their vision.

The laws of the Chinese are extremely rigid and severe. Even their fashions are under the control of the Emperor to such an extent that they are not allowed to change their clothing to adapt it to the seasons, till authorized by the example of the Viceroy or chief officer in each respective province, who also awaits the imperial edict. Notwithstanding their great severity, in many respects they appear to be very inefficient, owing in a great degree no doubt to the deception and bribery practiced among the mandarins.

The Chinese seem to have no statutory provisions for the poor generally, except that they are quartered upon certain districts, where they subsist by begging, with the provision that no man owning a house or shop can thrust them from his door without first giving them a cash, which is equal to about one-fourteenth of a cent. In consequence of this arrangement, the streets are thronged by them, especially in the fall of the year as they are migrating to a warmer climate. Some of them present the most wretched appearance of which the imagination can conceive.

A few mornings since, as I was returning from my usual walk, I met a funeral procession proceeding out of the city. In advance were two men with lighted lanterns, followed by a man bearing a straw sack containing ghost-money, which he was scattering in the street. Next followed a band of music, succeeded by a man with a torch, who burned a quantity of ghost-money at each angle of the road. Then a company of Touist priests walking double file, followed by two more at intervals with robes of coarse sacking girded with straw bands. Then a company of mourners on foot, followed by a large bier, covered with dark cloth, and borne by sixteen men, while five or six chairs, trimmed with white, containing the female friends of the deceased, brought up the rear. The whole scene was calculated to strike the beholder with a feeling of solemnity, notwithstanding its marks of heathenism and superstition. Their lamentations on such occasions, are truly heart-rending; for they mourn as those without hope. * * * *

The fifth of this month was the Chinese new year's day—a season of general mirth and festivity. Stores and shops were closed, and all business was laid aside for two or three days, and with some from ten to twenty days. On the evening previous, all are expected to have their debts square up for the year, and in case of failure their credit is ruined for the ensuing year. For about a week preceding, fire-crackers, gongs, and various kinds of music, were to be heard in all directions, and at nearly all hours of the night; and each morning the streets were strewed with the ashes of ghost-money, straw houses and images, paper, sedan chairs, &c. "On the last night of the old year at midnight, all engage in the performance of sacred rites, or in preparing their houses for the solemnities of the new year. Every dwelling is swept and garnished; and the shrine of the household gods decorated with huge porcelain dishes or vases containing the fragrant gourd—the large citron, called by them the hand of Budh." "Early in the morning of the first day, crowds repair to the different temples in their best attire" to conciliate the favor of their gods. "A man hardly knows his own domestics on that day, so finely are they attired; and on all sides along the streets may be seen the bowings and half-kneelings, with the affected efforts to prevent them, which constitutes a part of Chinese ceremonies of courtesy." So says Davis, in his History of China. Each house has a large red card pasted on the door, bearing the inscription, "happiness." From three to ten days are occupied in passing from house to house, making presents, congratulating friends, and receiving their hospitality. Each one carries a bundle of red cards containing his name and good wishes, which he leaves with those on whom he calls, and thrusts one through the cracks of the doors of those houses where he intends to call. Their proceedings were marked with as much civility as we usually witness in our own country on such occasions. For two days they strenuously avoid drawing water from their wells, lest (as is said) they should disturb the devils, who, they think, set apart those two days for rest and repose.

Last night (being the fifteenth of their month) was their feast of lanterns. The following is a very correct description of such occasions, given by Mr. Davis:—

"The first full moon of the new year is the feast of the lanterns, being a display of ingenuity and taste in the construction and machanism of an infinite variety of lanterns made of silk, varnish, horn, paper, and glass; some of them supplied with moving figures of men galloping on horse-back, fighting or performing various feats, together with numerous representations of beasts, birds, and other living creatures, the whole in full motion. The moving principle in these is the same with that of the smoke-jack, being a horizontal wheel turned by the draught of air created by the heat of the lamp. Their circular motion is communicated in various directions by fine threads attached to the moving figures." "The fire-works of the Chinese are sometimes ingenious and interesting, rather, however, on account of the variety of moving figures which they exhibit, than the brilliancy or skill of the pyrotechny, which is inferior to our own. Their best thing of the kind is what Europeans call a drum, from its being a cylindrical case, in which is contained a multitude of figures folded into a small space, and so contrived as to drop in succession on strings, and remain suspended in motion during the explosion of the various fire-works contained within the cylinder. They likewise contrive to make paper figures of boats to float and move upon the water by means of a stream of fire issuing from the stern. Their rockets are bad, but blue-lights they manufacture sufficiently well for the use of European ships."

There is in the suburbs of this city a Catholic cathedral of immense size going up. On the 8th I went, in company with several missionaries, to visit another large establishment beautifully situated, about four miles into the country, designed for preparing missionaries on their first arrival to send into the interior. We were received and entertained with much cordiality, and conducted through several of the principal apartments. It contains in all about forty rooms, including a small chapel. Our conductor informed us that there were about three thousand converts to their faith in that region.

Leaving this, we went to visit a pagoda, about a mile and a half distant, which the Chinese call, "Hs-bo-koo," situated on the Woosung, and four miles from this city. It is about one hundred feet in circumference at the base, of an octagonal shape, and seven stories or one hundred and fifty feet high, with a spire on the top. Each story is furnished with a veranda, guarded by a highly ornamented railing, and a projecting tiled roof over head. On each corner of this is hung a bell, with a flat piece of metal attached to the clapper, by which means a slight breeze keeps the whole fifty-six constantly ringing. On the inside are stairs by which we were enabled to ascend to the seventh story, where we had a delightful view of the surrounding country—a vast plain beautified with meandering rivers and canals. The inhabitants seem to be situated in little hamlets, with their farms stretching out from them as a centre. From this position we could see a group of hills about twenty miles distant, which are said to be abrupt and rocky, and the only ones that are to be found in this region of country. A few rods from this pagoda, are two heathen temples. The first is in a very neglected and dilapidated condition. It contains one idol, the only relict of its former glory, which is constructed of wood, and in a sitting posture, about twelve feet high, having its head covered with points of colored glass or stone. The other is about thirty-five feet square, with a variety of images on three sides, some having from four to eight arms. In the centre are three more, about six times the size of a common man; one of which sits on the back of an elephant reading a scroll. In one corner is a bell about eight feet high and five in diameter, hung in a frame and struck by a block of wood suspended at its side. On one side it is worn quite through, and nearly so where it is now beaten. In the opposite corner is a drum about four feet in diameter, which, with the bell, is probably used for waking the gods.

At a short distance from these, reaching across a branch of the Woosung, named "Pa-bo-kong," is an elegant bridge, which the natives call "Pa-bo-jaw." It is about two rods long, resting on two hexagonal granite abutments towards the centre, and supported near the ends with slabs of the same material set vertically; also covered at each end with similar slabs, twenty-five feet long, two wide, and thick enough for adequate strength. The rest is covered with bricks handsomely arched, and furnished with substantial railings.

CASTE IN MADURA.

Extract from Dr. Scudder's Journal in the Missionary Herald.

November 5, 1847.—A few days ago, while Mr. Muzzy was riding through the streets of this city, he requested a low caste man in his employ to go to the assistance of a high caste woman, who had been providentially knocked down and lay in the street. He refused, saying that he could do nothing for her, as she was of the Brahmin caste.

Here we have another instance of the direful effect of this system. The caste person, just alluded to, is a Pariah. The touch of this caste is considered to be pollution. If a high caste person goes into their houses, he loses his caste. If he drinks the water they have drawn, or drinks it from vessels which they have handled, he loses his caste. In some districts the poor Pariahs are so much despised, that they are obliged to make a long circuit when they see Brahmins in the way, that their breath may not infect them. In other places their approach is considered sufficient to pollute a whole neighborhood. For a Brahmin to touch one, even with the end of a long pole, would be defiling. Such being the state of things, if a Brahmin should see a Pariah in the act of being drowned, he could not afford him assistance. He must let him die. Should a Brahmin be in similar circumstances, the Pariah must let him die.

To our great sorrow we have lately been called to witness the bad effects of this system of caste in our missions. To give but a single instance. Not long since, Mr. Muzzy gave employment to one or two catechists from Tanjore. As it is the duty of these catechists to make a report of their labors, they stated that they had been to some low caste villages to proclaim the word of God, when they had not been near them. They chose rather to tell a lie, than to defile themselves by visiting them.

To give an instance of the effects of caste out of our circle. Not long since, one of the missionaries of the Gospel Propagation Society, thought it proper to employ a Pariah catechist to labor among the native Christians of his charge in Madras. This was an innovation, and it was complained of as such. "How can a Pariah catechist come into our house to pray?" some said. Others refused even to attend church, because he was permitted to read the Scriptures and sometimes a sermon. As the missionary would not yield to their wishes, more than four hundred and fifty persons of high caste left him, and formed a new congregation. About twenty only remained with him. Of course, whenever we see such relics of heathenism, we feel it to be our duty to root them out.

EFFECT OF POWER.—The beginning of Nero's reign was marked by acts of the greatest kindness and condescension; by affability, compliance, and popularity. The object of his administration seemed to be the good of his people; and, when he was desired to sign his name to a list of malefactors that were to be executed, he exclaimed, "I wish to heaven I could not write!" He was an enemy to flattery; and when the Senate had liberally commended the wisdom of his government, Nero desired them to keep their praises till he deserved them. But mark the corresponding tendency of arbitrary power! This was the wretch, who afterwards assassinated his mother, who set fire to Rome, and destroyed multitudes of men, women, and children, and threw the odium of that dreadful action on the Christians. The cruelties he exercised towards them were beyond description, while he seemed to be the only one who enjoyed the tragical spectacle. "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked; who can know it?" [Arvine.

THE HOLY LAND.

Written by Lamartine previous to his departure for Palestine, about 1835.

I have not felt o'er seas of sand
 The rocking of the desert bark;
Nor laved in Hebron's fount my hand,
 By Hebron's palm trees cool and dark;
Nor pitched my tent at even-fall,
 On dust where Job of old has lain,
Nor dreamed beneath its canvas wall,
 The dream of Jacob o'er again.

One vast world-page remains unread;
 How shine the stars in Chaldea's sky,
How sounds the reverend pilgrim's tread,
 How beats the heart with God so nigh!
How round gray arch and column lone,
 The spirit of old time broods,
And sighs in all the winds that moan
 Along the sandy solitudes!

In thy tall cedars, Lebanon,
 I have not heard the nation's cries,
Nor seen thy eagles stooping down
 Where buried Tyre in ruin lies.
The Christian's prayer I have not said
 In Tadmor's temples of decay,
Nor startled with my dreary tread
 The waste where Memnon's empire lay.

Nor have I from thy hallowed tide,
 Oh Jordan! heard the low lament,
Like that sad wail along thy side,
 Which Israel's mournful prophet sent!
Nor thrilled within that grotto lone,
 Where deep in night, the Bard of Kings
Felt hands of fire direct his own,
 And swept for God the conscious strings.

I have not climbed to Olivet,
 Nor laid me where my Saviour lay,
And left his trace of tears, as yet
 By angel eyes unwept away;
Nor watched at midnight's solemn time,
 The garden where his prayer and groan,
Wrung by his sorrow and our crime,
 Rose to one listening ear alone.

I have not kissed the rock-hewn grot,
 Where in His mother's arms He lay,
Nor knelt upon the sacred spot
 Where last His footsteps pressed the clay;
Nor looked on that sad mountain head,
 Nor smote my sinful breast where wide
His arms to fold the world he spread,
 And bowed his head to bless, and—died!

"SIR, WHO HAVE YOU BEEN TALKING WITH?"

There lived in the town of ——, in Vt., says a correspondent of the Christian Mirror, a man who had a large family of children. He was poor, and unable to keep them at home; he put some of them away from home to live. It was the favored lot of a little girl, I think, about eight years of age, to fall into a family where daily prayer was offered up to Almighty God. Prayer she was unacquainted with. The subject was new to her. An astonishment seized her, when she saw her master, night and morning, talking, as she termed it, with something that she could not see. An anxiety swelled in her little bosom to know who it could be. Unwilling to ask any one of the family with whom she lived, yet solicitous to know, she obtained leave to go home. She had hardly reached the lonely cottage, before she asked her mother who it was that her master talked with, night and morning. She told her that she did not know, being herself a heathen, though in a Christian land. Not satisfied, she asked her father, who answered, in a thoughtless and inhuman manner, "The devil, I suppose." The inquisitive little child returned uninformed to her master, where she witnessed the same promptitude and holy ardor as before. Not many days had elapsed, before she summoned fortitude enough to put the question.

One morning, after her master had been talking with the unknown Being, she stepped up before him, and said, "Sir, who have you been talking with, this morning?" The question was so unexpected, and from such a source, that at first he felt unable to answer her; and was unusually impressed with the importance of the duty of prayer, and the weight of obligation resting upon him to approach God aright. But after recollecting himself a little, he said, and that with reverence, "I have been trying to talk with God." "God!" said she with astonishment, "where is he? where does he live?" &c. Many questions of a similar nature she put with much interest and feeling, to which her master gave her such answers as were calculated to awaken the liveliest feelings of her mind, in regard to Jehovah. After she had learned all her little mind could contain of divine things, she desired to go home and see her parents, with an earnestness that could not be resisted. Go she must; leave was granted; she went home to her father's cottage, a place where prayer was not wont to be made, with her little bosom beating with a high tone of pious feeling in view of the importance of prayer. She went to her father, and said, "Father, pray." She urged with warmth a compliance; but he utterly refused. She then went to her mother and asked her to pray; but with no better success. She could not endure it any longer; her feelings must vent themselves in words. She said, let us pray. She knelt down and prayed, and it appears to me, that the Scripture was fulfilled. "The effectual fervent prayer of the righteous availeth much." In answer to her prayer, both of her parents were brought under conviction, which terminated in hopeful conversion to God. And this was the beginning of an extensive revival of religion.

A CUTTING REPLY.—An avaricious divine seeing a poor boy in a deplorable condition, called him to the door, and giving him a piece of mouldy bread, asked him if he could read, to which he answered in the negative; to the question whether he could say the Belief and the Lord's Prayer, the answer was the same. "Well," said the divine, "I will teach you that: Our Father." "Our Father," repeated the boy; "What! your Father as well as mine?" "Yes, certainly." "Then we are brothers." "To be sure we are," was the ready reply. "Why, then," said the boy, pulling the crust from behind his coat, "how could you give your poor brother this mouldy piece of bread?"

HABITS OF CHRISTIANS.

There is a beautiful story told of a pious Quaker lady, who was much addicted to smoking tobacco. She had indulged herself in this habit, until it had increased so much upon her, that she not only smoked her pipe a large portion of the day, but frequently sat up in bed for this purpose in the night. After one of these nocturnal entertainments she fell asleep, and dreamed that she died and approached heaven. Meeting an angel she asked him if her name was written in the book of life. He disappeared; but replied, upon returning, that he could not find it. "O," said she, "do look again; it must be there." He examined again; but returned with a sorrowful face saying, that it was not there! "O," said she in agony, "it must be there! I have an assurance that it is there! Do look once more!" The angel was moved to tears by her entreaties, and again left her to renew his search. After a long absence, he came back, his face radiant with joy, and exclaimed, "we have found it! we have found it! it was so clouded and covered with tobacco smoke that we could hardly see it!" The good woman, upon waking, immediately threw her pipe away, and never indulged in smoking again.

THE FROZEN DEAD AT ST. BERNARD.

The scene of the greatest interest at the Hospice—a solemn, extraordinary interest, indeed—is that of the Morgue, or building where the dead bodies of lost travelers are deposited. There they are, some of them as when the breath of life departed, and the death angel, with his instruments of frost and snow, stiffened and embalmed for ages. The floor is thick with nameless skulls and bones, and human dust heaped in confusion. But around the wall are groups of poor sufferers in the very position in which they were found, as rigid as marble, and in this air, by the preserving element of an eternal frost, almost as crumbling. There is the mother and child, a most affecting image of suffering and love. The face of the little one remains pressed to the mother's bosom, only the back part of the skull being visible, the body enfolded in her careful arms—careful in vain—to shield her offspring from the elemental wrath of the tempest. The snow fell fast and thick, and the hurricane wound them up in one white shroud, and buried them. There is also a tall, strong man, standing alone, the face dried and black, but the white unbroken teeth firmly set and close, grinning from the fleshless jaws—it is a most awful spectacle. The face seems to look at you from the recesses of the sepulchre, as if it would tell you the story of a fearful death struggle in the storm. There are other groups more indistinct, but these two are never to be forgotten, and the whole of these dried and frozen remnants of humanity are a terrific demonstration of the fearfulness of this mountain pass, when the elements let loose in fury encounter the unhappy traveler. You look at this through the grated window; there is just light enough to make it solemnly and distinctly visible, and to read in it a powerful record of mental and physical agony, and of maternal love in death. The little child hiding its face in its mother's bosom, and both frozen to death—one can never forget the group, nor the memento mori, nor the token of deathless love. [Dr. Cheever's Wanderings.

CHRISTIAN DECISION.—If the word of God be true, submit yourselves to it in all things, even in those which are ever so opposed to our corrupt nature and wayward desires. Believe it heartily, both in its promises and threatenings. Neither attempt to compromise between God and the world. If Christianity be of God, decide for it with both body and soul; embrace the cross; be willing to suffer affliction with the despised people of God; forsake the pomps, pleasures, and vanities of the world, and employ all your endeavors to promote the kingdom and glory of Christ. Do not waver between the righteousness of Christ and your own. Which of the two will avail you in the judgment? If it be only the righteousness of Christ, then value yourselves no longer on your own supposed virtues. Neither be undecided as to the choice of your friends and associates; "he that is not with me," saith Christ, "is against me, and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth." [Krummacher.

DON'T COMPLAIN.—A merchant was one day returning from market. He was on horseback, and behind his saddle was a valise filled with money. The rain fell with violence, and the good old man was wet to the skin. At this time he was quite vexed, and murmured because God had given him such hard weather for his journey. He soon reached the border of a thick forest. What was his terror on beholding on one side of the road a robber, who, with his levelled gun, was aiming at him, and attempting to fire; but the powder being wet with the rain, the gun did not go off, and the merchant giving spur to his horse, fortunately had time to escape. As soon as he found himself safe, he said to himself, "how wrong was I not to endure the rain patiently, as sent by Providence! If the weather had been dry and fair, I should not probably have been alive at this hour. The rain which caused me to murmer came at a fortunate moment to save my life, and preserve my property."

SAILORS.—At a recent meeting of a benevolent society in Bangor, Me., the Rev. Mr. Chickering remarked, that since his return from Europe he had four wonders respecting seamen. 1. That any parent ever sends a son to sea. 2. That any sailor ever goes to sea a second time. 3. That any man who is a sailor is not morally ruined. 4. That so little is done by Christians in behalf of sailors.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The Sixth Anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association was held at New Market, N. J., on the fifth and sixth days of last week, Sept. 7th and 8th. The attendance was quite large, and the deliberations generally interesting.

The exercises were introduced with a discourse by Eld. Eli S. Bailey, from Rom. 10 : 5—15. In the outset, the preacher portrayed the fallen and degraded condition of men, the insufficiency of all humanly-devised schemes for their reformation, and the impossibility of solving the problem how a sinner can be saved without a knowledge of the plan of salvation revealed in the Word of God. He then showed the necessity of receiving the Gospel by faith, in opposition to the notion that men may be saved in ignorance of Christ or without relying upon him. In view of this he urged the duty of activity on the part of the Christian church, as the grand instrumentality for preaching the Gospel to those who sit in darkness. The various objections which are from time to time presented against missions in general, and a foreign mission in particular, were stated and answered very clearly and with good effect. The preacher had been intimately acquainted with all the proceedings of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination from the time when there were but eight churches and twelve hundred members to the present time. Their increase commenced with an increase of missionary labor, and their growth has been very nearly in proportion to the amount of such labor performed. Within the last thirty years their increase has been greater than for two hundred years previous. But the work is now only begun, and must be pressed forward with increased vigor.

The Treasurer's Report was presented soon after the opening of the session, and showed rather an encouraging state of things. There has been received during the year, including the balance when the last report was made, $1744 27; paid out during the same time, $1095 90; leaving a balance in the treasury of $649 37. It was also stated, in connection with this report, that a variety of useful articles for the missionaries had been received and forwarded to their destination.

The Annual Report of the Executive Board was presented and read by the Corresponding Secretary. This document is lengthy, and will abundantly repay a perusal when it shall be placed in a printed form before the public. We can only say now, that it shows a good degree of attention to their business on the part of the Board, and presents such facts connected with the foreign mission as are calculated to awaken gratitude in the hearts of its friends. The last Annual Report left our missionaries in China, discussing the merits of different places as fields of labor. The present report shows that they have not only selected their field, but have been for about a year successfully pursuing their studies preparatory to the work, and are now beginning to speak to the heathen of the plan of salvation through Jesus Christ. In the department of domestic missions, but little has been done, on account of the deficiency of funds placed at the command of the Board. Incipient steps have been taken, however, for the establishment of a mission in the western part of this country, which, it is hoped, will prove a blessing to the denomination and the world.

Eld. James Bailey moved that the Report be adopted, and published under the direction of the Board. He accompanied his motion with remarks, in which he alluded very feelingly to the evidences of divine favor which were seen in the progress of our mission in China. He said he could not contemplate them without grateful emotions, and he was sure there were thousands who would read the report with similar emotions. Some of our aged brethren, as they look at the prospects of the mission, will be ready to say, with Simeon of old, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace." Many of our brethren in middle life will find their strength and confidence increased. And not a few, who are preparing for usefulness in Christ's vineyard, will see new light shining upon their path. They will feel assured that a field will open as soon and as rapidly as they are prepared to occupy it.

Mr. Wm. M. Jones, a missionary to Hayti from the Baptist Free Mission Society, followed, and spoke of his emotions in contemplating the labors of missionaries as presented in the report. He knew something of the feelings of missionaries. Standing as they do in the midst of heathenism, they become identified with their work, and feel that to do it is their meat and drink, and that to abandon it would be their greatest deprivation. He then alluded to the common expectation and desire to see the fruits of labor bestowed—a desire which is prehaps in many cases too strong. Some of the most successful missions have waited long for the blessing, but it has come in due time, and so it will in every case where labor is faithfully bestowed.

The following resolution was presented by Wm. B. Maxson, and adopted by the Association:—

Resolved, That the kindness of our Heavenly Father, in protecting the lives of our missionaries, and otherwise favoring them in the dispensations of his providence, demands our warmest gratitude; and that we will not cease to implore the continuance of his kindness.

Bro. Maxson, in presenting the above resolution, spoke of the changes which had taken place since the foreign mission was determined upon. Then we looked around for men to engage in the work, scarcely knowing where to find them; and as our thoughts ran forward to the day when they should be found and go forth, we anticipated evil tidings from them, because we had not learned to trust the Lord in all these things. But now what do we see? The men have been found; they have gone forth; their journey was pleasant; their settlement was auspicious; they have entered upon their labors; and instead of sad news and disappointments, we have nothing discouraging, but every thing to cheer us. How appropriate, in view of the facts of the case, is such an expression of thankfulness as is contained in this resolution! Allusion was then made to the change which has taken place in respect to the support of the mission. When the enterprise was proposed, doubts were expressed of our ability to support it, and some even refused to help, because they regarded the project as visionary. But now the possibility of sustaining it has been proved, and it would be much easier to increase the mission than it was at first to start it.

Eld. N. V. Hull presented the following resolution, which was remarked upon by himself, Eld. W. B. Gillett, and others, and adopted:—

Resolved, That no enterprise is more truly in consonance with the nature of Christianity, than that of missions, and that it is inconsistent with real discipleship to withhold from it our aid.

Bro. Hull spoke of the condition of man by nature, and the wonderful change produced upon him by regeneration. In nothing is this change more manifest, than in his views of his appropriate work. The renewed man, instead of regarding his own gratification as the end of life, sees a noble work before him, to expend his energies and strength in religious enterprises—in doing good to the world. Reference was then made to the benefits which we enjoy through the Christian religion, and in view of them the claims of the heathen were urged. The speaker regarded the declaration of the resolution, that the missionary spirit is indispensable to Christianity, as an axiom with all those who have had true Christian experience.

Bro. Gillett spoke of the ways in which private individuals, even in the humblest walks, may aid the missionary work. Those who have not talents to engage personally in the work, nor means to contribute largely, may act as agents in their own neighborhoods. The duty and advantages of efforts of this kind, are not understood and appreciated. If they were, there would be no complaint of inability to serve the missionary cause, and no lack of funds.

Resolved, That this Association considers it important that our missionary operations be enlarged, and that the spirit of missions should be cultivated in our churches, until witnesses to the everlasting equity and perpetuity of God's law, and to the gospel of Jesus as the only power competent to save souls, shall be sent to all lands.

The above resolution was presented and advocated by Eld. Eli S. Bailey. In regard to the enlargement of our missionary operations, he spoke earnestly. He regarded it as the substance of Christianity to love God and man; and the existence of that spirit necessarily prompts to action. The design that the Gospel should extend its influence, is indicated by the figure of a stone cut out of the mountain. Furthermore, the commission of the disciples, required them to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. In order to the increase of our missionary operations, there must be an increase of the missionary spirit, for the two go together. And the only way to increase the missionary spirit is to present the doctrine of the cross in its simplicity and purity. If that will not do it, nothing else will. The importance of multiplying witnesses to the validity of the divine law was warmly urged in view of the fact that so few are engaged in that work.

Eld. Wm. B. Maxson followed with some remarks on the importance of enlarging our operations. He thought we ought not to be contented with our present number of missionaries, and he regarded the prospect as much better now for the support of an increased number than it was originally for the support of the two we first proposed to send out.

The following resolution was presented by Eld. Samuel Davison, and adopted by the Association. Bro. Davison made some interesting remarks in support of the resolution, but our notes of them are not sufficiently ample to enable us even to give their substance:—

Resolved, That while the efforts of missionary enterprise, moved and regulated in strict accordance with the requirements of God, should be used with unremitting diligence, our dependence for success at last is not upon him that planteth, or upon him that watereth, but upon God that giveth the increase.

Eld. Lucius Crandall moved the following resolution, which was adopted after some remarks:—

Resolved, That we instruct our Board to proceed to the employment of a missionary permanently in some destitute region of the West.

Eld. Wm. B. Maxson moved the following resolution, which was adopted:—

Rerolved, That this Association instruct the Executive Board to make the necessary arrangements for adding to the mission at Shanghai in China one or two missionaries as soon as circumstances will warrant.

Eld. Wm. M. Jones, a missionary of the Free Baptist Mission Society, being present, requested permission to say something in relation to the position and plans of that Society. The permission was granted, and he proceeded to state that the Society is composed principally of Baptists who have seceded from their denominational missionary organizations on account of their connection with slavery; that it has a mission in Hayti, now in a flourishing condition; that the friends of the Society are establishing a literary institution at McGrawville, Cortland Co., N. Y.; that they desire a friendly acquaintance with us, and would be glad to see a delegate from us at a semi-annual meeting of the Society soon to be held in McGrawville, or at the annual meeting in Charles town, Mass., in May next. The subject was taken up by the Association, and the Corresponding Secretary was directed to communicate with the McGrawville meeting, acknowledging the visit of Mr. Jones, and expressing our friendly feelings. Lucius Crandall and S. S. Griswold were appointed delegates to the annual meeting in May next.

A question was raised as as to the propriety of securing an incorporation of the Association under the general law of the State of New York, so as to enable it to hold property and receive bequests. After some discussion, the subject was referred to the Board, with full power to act in the case.

The Association adjourned to meet with the First Church in Hopkinton, R. I., on the first day of the week before the second Sabbath in Sept., 1849, at 10 o'clock A. M., when a missionary discourse is to be preached by Eld. Lucius Crandall.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE TRACT SOCIETY.

The American Sabbath Tract Society held its fifth Anniversary at New Market, N. J., on sixth-day, Sept. 8. Prayer was offered by Eld. Joshua Clarke, after which the President read the Constitution, and a list of delegates was made out.

The Treasurers' Report was presented soon after the meeting was organized, from which it appears that the receipts for the year have been small, amounting only to $456 81. The expenses have been $259 54, leaving a balance in the Treasury of $197 27.

The Annual Report of the Board of Directors was read by the Recording Secretary. The Board has made considerable effort during the past year to secure the services of a General Agent who should devote his entire energies to the objects contemplated in the Society's organization, by lecturing from place to place, introducing Sabbath publications to notice, forming new auxiliary societies and stimulating to renewed action those already in existence, and when not otherwise employed superintending the Society's Depository and preparing its issues. But no agent has been employed, because the subscriptions for that object have not been sufficient, in the judgment of the Board, to warrant them in going forward. In consequence of the attention given to this subject, probably less has been done than would otherwise, in the way of gratuitous distribution of tracts by colporteurs. Besides furnishing its stereotyped tracts to those who have wished them, the Board has issued a new tract of eight pages, entitled "Misuse of the term Sabbath;" also a German translation of tract No. 10, entitled "The true Sabbath Embraced and Observed," and an old and valuable work by Edward Stennett, first printed in 1658, entitled "The Royal Law contended for." The Report concludes thus:—"The Board would remind the Society, that the signs of the times are indicative of our duty to be on the alert. Probably there never was a period, when there was so little confidence in the claims of the first day of the week to religious regard, as at present. In various forms, the Sabbath question is agitating the public mind. May the Lord of the Sabbath imbue us deeply with the spirit of wisdom and might, that we may be prepared to act our part as we ought."

The reading of the Annual Report was followed by remarks from a number of individuals in relation to the condition of the Society, and the best means of promoting its interests. Among the speakers were S. S. Griswold, W. B. Maxson, Lucius Crandall, Samuel Davison, Eli S. Bailey, James Bailey, and T. B. Stillman, all of whom seemed to regard the Society as an important auxiliary of our common cause, and to desire that its operations may be enlarged. We are confident that another year will enable the Board to report a larger amount of labor in the way of distributing tracts, and will show a growing interest in this work on the part of the denomination.

The subject of appointing an agent, to labor constantly in behalf of the Society, was discussed at considerable length, and finally referred to the Board. An amendment of the Constitution, bearing upon this point, was proposed by Paul Stillman, and adopted. The first article of the Constitution defines the object of the Society as being, "to promote the Scriptural observance of the Sabbath, in connection with the interests of vital godliness and sound morality, by the circulation of religious tracts;" to which was added, "and the employment of colporteurs and agents."

The time and place of the next meeting of the Society was left to be fixed by the Executive Board.

CHRISTIANITY UNIVERSAL.

Does the Bible teach the ultimate conversion of the World to Christianity?

To a reflecting mind, the moral aspect of the world is not the most pleasing. Borne down by error, the race has long groaned under a weight of sorrow. Earth and its elements seem to have conspired to render the scene still more dismal. Its briars and thorns have goaded man to desperation, while erratic reason has failed to point him to a sovereign antidote. As the wandering mariner, bereft of his compass, and driven by the storms and tempests of the ocean, is unmanned by foreboding ruin, so is it with man. His frail bark has been the sport of winds and storms, while fearful premonitions have nearly engulfed him in despair. His hopes, so long deferred, have made his heart sick. But is man ever to sorrow on?—are his hopes always to be blasted? Has earth a sorrow that Heaven can not cure?

That man is a lapsed being, reason and revelation testify. But a lapsed state is not always of necessity a hopeless state. Man is therefore a "prisoner of hope." Although sin has entailed consequences most serious upon our race, whereby its fairest prospects of moral and intellectual improvement have been blighted, yet may we not adopt the language of Campbell?—

> "O Zion! lift thy raptured eye,
> The long expected hour is nigh;
> The joys of nature rise again,
> The Prince of Salem comes to reign."

And of Watts—

> "No more let sin and sorrow grow,
> Nor thorns infest the ground;
> He comes to make his blessings flow
> Far as the curse is found."

That a period, pregnant with blessings, is yet to arrive in the history of our world, has been maintained by many in all ages. For this the bard has strung his lyre; ancient seers, with prophetic ken, have seen the glorious scene rise upon their vision; and the revelator John, while exiled in Patmos, viewed the glory of the latter day in dramatic symbols.

The general expectation, that a golden age is yet to transpire, is strong presumptive evidence of such an event. But over and above all this, we have the sure word of prophecy touching the subject. Isaiah 2: 24, says, "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the tops of the mountain," &c. See also Is. 11th, 49th, and 60th chapters; and Daniel 7: 27. See also Matthew 13: 23, where the kingdom of heaven is likened unto leaven hid in meal till the whole was leavened. See also Revelations 19th, 20th, 21st, and 22d chapters, particularly the 19th.

The above are but a few among the many passages in the Bible which foretell a period of greater prosperity than this world has ever enjoyed since man was exiled from Eden. But whether this will be the result of conversions to Christianity through the medium of a preached gospel, or whether it will be caused by the direct personal appearance of Jesus Christ to establish a new kingdom, or whether it will be the resurrection state of the dead, is the question. And so long as the mind vacillates upon the answer, so long will effort to accomplish the object be weakened. Faith must be fixed to be operative. It must stand on the "munition of rocks." The great question, then, relative to the subject, appears to be, Is the millennial glory of the church, or the fulfillment of prophecy concerning the latter day, the result of physical or moral omnipotence. S. S. G.

The Western Mission.—We are happy to announce, that the Executive Board of the Missionary Association has determined to establish a permanent mission at the West. Bro. Samuel Davison has been appointed to the work, and is authorized by the Board to visit different sections of Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin, for the purpose of selecting the best field to be occupied. Bro. Davison expects to attend the approaching meeting of the South-Western Association, and to proceed thence on his tour of exploration. A full statement of the plan will probably soon be laid before the denomination by the Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Association.

Revival.—Bro. John Sphinx has been holding a series of evening meetings for some weeks past in Purdy Creek, in Hartsville, N. Y., which have, under the blessing of God, resulted in the hopeful conversion of some fifty souls, most of whom have united with the Methodist Episcopal Church.

SLAVERY AND WAR.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

From a recent number of the New York Tribune, we learn that Gen. Gaines, in his general order on resuming the command of the eastern division of the army, speaks of war and slavery as great evils, but which have nevertheless contributed to civilization! He adds, that he has been a warrior and a slaveholder, because he loved peace and freedom; and that both evils will disappear in the coming century, if the American people will do their duty. Aye, here is the rub; that fatal if, which stands in the way of or opposed to the accomplishment of so many noble purposes. If Government officers had done their "duty," we should have had no war with Mexico, and saved thousands of valuable lives, and near a hundred millions of money. If the southern slaveholders had done their "duty" to their African slaves we should have no slavery at the present time to contend about. That war will never cease while slavery exists, is in my opinion as evident as that light will never cease on earth while the sun continues above the horizon.

When the United States felt themselves oppressed by the tyranny of Great Britain, they petitioned in vain for a redress of their grievances. No attempts were made to settle the controversy by arbitration, but they appealed to arms, and obtained their liberty, and an honorable peace, and a conspicuous station among the nations of the earth. Unhappy Ireland is following our example. She has our sympathies and best wishes for her success. And thus will it ever be, while time endures. The same cause ever has and ever will produce the same effect. If then slavery must be abolished, I think our duty is made plain, while we adhere strictly to the Wilmot Proviso, to maintain an uncompromising hostility to the farther extension of slavery in the United States, leaving the original slave States in the full enjoyment of liberty to manage their own business in their own way, and to fight their own battles. Mr. J. Van Buren, in his speech at Philadelphia, says, "Slavery must extend itself or die." If so, by confining it to the present limits we have a double chance to accelerate its fall.

Gen. Gaines says he has been a warrior and a slaveholder, because he loved peace and freedom. Can slavery produce freedom or peace? As soon might we "expect grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles." "A corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit, neither can a good tree bring forth evil fruit."

I was always an enemy to slavery, but never an abolitionist, because I could not see the propriety of taking the subject to the ballot-boxes, for I firmly believed nothing could be done by law to interfere with the provisions of the Constitution. But the case seems now to be altered. Gen. Gaines says we have a duty to do, and I firmly believe it, not only at the polls, but at our fire-sides, in our work-shops, and in our closets.

I believe there is nothing prophetic, in holy writ, of the existence or termination of slavery, as I do not find the word slave but twice from the beginning to the end of the book; but of war it is said, that the nations shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning hooks, and learn war no more; and I would feign believe that the happy day is fast approaching and near at hand. J. S.

A QUESTION FOR THE CURIOUS.

The editor of the Ohio Bugle thinks that the next presidential inauguration will raise a perplexing question. It seems that the 4th of March, the day fixed by the Constitution for the inauguration of the President, occurs on Sunday. "Now as James K. Polk cannot hold the office over that Sunday, nor the President elect be inaugurated before, either the Sabbath must be broken by the ceremony, or the people will have to be one day without a President. As that officer is the head of the government, the government will have no head, and it is to be presumed no life. This nation will therefore have to break the Sabbath or adopt No-Governmentism for at least one day. Which is the lesser evil?"

We do not think there will be much difficulty in the case. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has recently decided that the observance of Sunday is merely a civil regulation, and of course entirely under the control of the civil authorities. Now let the Supreme Court of the United States announce the same opinion, and it will be very easy to make the people think, that such important civil business as the inauguration of a President may properly be attended to on a day which has no sacredness except what the civil law gives it. Or, if there is any doubt about convincing the people that it would be right to proceed with the inauguration on Sunday, just let Congress pass a law authorizing such a course, and then certainly there can be no qualms on the subject.

Strange Use of Churches.—The old Dutch Church on the corner of Nassau and Liberty streets, N. Y., was turned into a riding school during the revolutionary war, and is now used as the Post Office. Thousands walk daily over vaults in which our Dutch ancestors repose, searching for news from the living. The little church at the corner of Frankfort and William streets, in which so many Hessian officers were buried during the war, in full regimentals, is now used as an auction room, and the auctioneer knocks down property from that pulpit where for so many years peace and good will were preached.

General Intelligence.

EUROPEAN NEWS.

Since our last the steamship Hibernia arrived at Boston, bringing us full reports from the continent up to the 25th, and from Liverpool to the 26th ult., the day of sailing.

The news is not so exciting as it sometimes has been, but it never was more important, whether viewed in reference to the old world or the new. Nearly all the revolutionary feelings of Europe seem to have effervesced, and there will be comparative quiet for a while; worse things than political turmoils are likely to befall the nations of the old world. The spread of the potato rot, and the unfavorable prospects of the harvest in all parts of England, owing to the prevalence of cold and wet weather, are, in truth, the most painfully interesting items of intelligence received by the steamer.

Among the most important news is that of the destruction of the packet ship "Ocean Monarch," 1300 tons burthen, Capt. Murdock. She was discovered to be on fire, when but a few hours sail from Liverpool on her way to Boston, with 380 souls on board. The fire originated through the carelessness of one of the steerage passengers. Fortunately the ship was in sight of a number of other vessels, all of which hastened to her assistance; yet too late to save more than 229 of the 380 on board, thus leaving 151 who are supposed to have perished.

The Irish trials were proceeding slowly. The only one of the rebels yet convicted is John Martin, proprietor of the Felon newspaper, who was sentenced to ten years' transportation. This is probably the mildest sentence that any of them can anticipate.

There have been no satisfactory changes in France. Marrast, the editor of the National, has been reelected President of the National Assembly, and he appears to be the most powerful man in the Nation, after Cavaignac. Lamartine has become so unpopular that he received two votes only, as the rival of Marrast.

From Italy and Germany there is nothing new of particular importance.

There was a reported insurrection in Petersburg, but probably without foundation.

The most peculiarly interesting intelligence from the north of Europe is that of the spread of the Cholera. This terrible disease is steadily making its way westward, like star of empire, and providentially fortunate shall we indeed be, if we escape a visitation of the scourge until a year from this time.

◆

Homœpathy and Allopathy.—The proportion of deaths reported from Russia and the Turkish Provinces of Moldavia, in the present progress of the Cholera, seems to exceed even that which characterized its former visits. In the alarm created by the statistics of this invader, considerable attention seems likely to be excited by statements put forth by the Homœpathists of the comparative mortality under their treatment and under that of the Allopathists. Documents, some of which are beyond question, and which extend over a large number of cases, show the Homœpathic loss of patients to have been about 8 per cent.; while under the ordinary treatment it was forty per cent. Certified returns have also been published of the comparative results of the respective methods in the treatment of the aggravated form of dysentery, prevalent during the famine in Ireland in 1847. These show 14 per cent. of deaths under the Homœpathic against 36 per cent. under the Allopathic, and as they have been widely made known, it is probable that if the Cholera should ultimately reach us, the two systems will now be tried side by side to a sufficient extent to afford to the medical profession the means of distinctly forming a judgment on the question.

◆

Fruit Growers' Convention.—The N. Y. Tribune says that the Great National Convention of Fruit Growers, to be held in Judson's Hotel, in this city, on the 10th of October, bids fair, from the extensive preparations in progress, to be a fine affair. Twenty-five delegates from the Pennsylvania Horticultural Society have been commissioned to represent that body, and notices of other appointments have been made. One of the principal objects of calling the Convention, is to effect a comparison of fruits from different sections of the country, with a view of arriving at correct conclusions as to their merits, to settle doubtful points concerning them, and to adopt, if possible, a uniform and systematic nomenclature.

New Mexico.—The Santa Fe Republican of the 16th of July, having just received the message of Governor Wood, of Texas, in which he sets up a paper claim to the best portion of New Mexico, ridicules the pretension with great severity. It says that Texas might as well have legislated a claim to Louisiana, as to any portion of New Mexico; that if the Texan authorities attempt to govern that country, they will find themselves awfully taken in; and that Mexico has a population competent to elect their own officers and make their own laws, and never will submit to this unexpected and unjust claim. "We are well aware that the Government is too well acquainted with the location and position of this country ever to acknowledge it as a part of Texas."

Curiosities.—The Rockingham (Va.) Register gives an account of something new in the curiosity line:—"The celebrated 'Runkel Family,' of Rockingham, we understand, will start in a few days down the valley, with the intention of visiting different portions of the United States. This family, consisting of two brothers and two sisters, will be found to be objects of no ordinary curiosity, being, in all probability the largest family of human beings ever exhibited in this or any other country. Their united weight is 1,400 lbs! One of the young ladies is so fleshy as to be unable to walk, and when moving of her own accord goes upon her hands and knees. They are of the ordinary height, and their mother is an unusually small woman; their father, however, is an ordinary sized man.

◆

Large Sale of Steamboats.—Messrs. Daniel Drew and Isaac Newton, proprietors of the People's Line of steamboats on the North River, and Messrs. Converse & Co., Wm. W. Colt and Horace Whittiker, of Norwich, as we learn from the Boston Advertiser, have purchased of the Norwich and Worcester Railroad Company, their interest in the steamboat line between this city and Norwich, consisting of the steamers Worcester, Knickerbocker, and Cleopatra. They also promise to build a new boat, to be completed next spring, and with the whole, to run as at present, in connection with the Boston and Worcester, and Norwich and Worcester Railroads. By this arrangement the debt of the Norwich Railroad Company is reduced $200,000.

◆

The Murderer of Mr. Schoolcraft.—Letters, says the Cleveland Times, received from Sault St. Marie, state that disclosures have been recently made at Fort Brady, indicating that the assassination of the late James L. Schoolcraft, near that fort, on the 6th of July, 1846, was directly or indirectly, the act of Lieut. Tilden, the officer who was subsequently convicted of robbery and murder in the city of Mexico, and sentenced to be hanged.

◆

Great Fire in Brooklyn.—There was a fire in the city of Brooklyn on the evening of the 9th inst., which burned six hours, laid waste eight blocks of buildings in the most active part of the city, destroying upward of two hundred houses, and property to the value of one million five hundred thousand dollars. Among the buildings destroyed were three churches, the post-office, and several others belonging to the public.

SUMMARY.

Mr. Branin, of Trenton, N. J., has some wheat from the bank of the river nearly opposite Catskill, where it had remained ever since the year 1777. The building in which it had been stored was burned down that year, and several thousand bushels of the grain, completely charred, were suffered to remain on the spot. By scratching the bank with his fingers, Mr. B. informs us that the wheat rolled down, perfect in size and form. Wagon loads of it have thus remained for seventy-one years, incorporated with the earth, and exposed to the action of the elements, without showing any disposition to modify its principles.

The Milledgeville Journal of the 22d ult. says: The boll worm has commenced its ravages upon the cotton in our vicinity. A neighbor brought to our office yesterday about half a peck of cotton bolls, some partly open and others in every state of growth, completely destroyed. These were stated to have been taken from only two or three stalks. It remains to be seen to what extent further damages may be done.

We are happy to learn that the foundation of the Washington National Monument is moving upward as rapidly as the nature of the work will admit. It is eighty feet square, and of solid stone. The masonry is said to be, so far, most skilfully and carefully executed, and promises to do great credit to all concerned in the erection of this magnificent memorial of the gratitude of the American people to the illustrious father of his country.

There has been great suffering among the Mormons at Salt Lake, California, on account of a want of provisions, being obliged to kill their working cattle for food, and their stock of breadstuffs was nearly exhausted. Their wheat and barley crops have been entirely destroyed by crickets, which appeared in astonishing numbers, and, like the locusts, destroyed every kind of vegetation in their path.

The Newport papers mention the death of Mrs. Wilkes, the wife of Capt. Wilkes, who commanded the South Sea Exploring Expedition. She was spending the season at Bellevue Hotel, and died during the absence of her husband in the south. Mrs. W. was the sister of Prof. Renwick, of Columbia College, and daughter of Robert Burns' celebrated Blue Eyed Mary.

The Albany Journal says: There is a law in this State which holds railroad companies pecuniarily responsible for deaths on their roads. Under this law Mr. Howard, father of the young man who was killed in May last, by a collision near Herkimer, applied for damages, and the Company offered to pay all expenses and $2,200 besides. The offer was accepted.

We would caution our readers against all torn or deficient notes, as the rogues seem to have changed, in part, their method of operation. Genuine bills on the Farmer's Bank of Albany, are in circulation, we understand, so skilfully torn and put together again, that one bill is gained from the pieces taken from every ten so altered.

The Philadelphia Ledger says: The new experiment of executing the printing of Congress by contract, which went into operation at the beginning of the last session, has saved to the Government already nearly eighty-nine thousand dollars.

In the seven months of this year to the 31st of July, the whole number of immigrants arrived at this port in vessels from abroad, was 101,404. In the eighth previous months, or from the 5th of May (the time of the organization of the Department of the Commissioners of Emigration) to the 31st of December, the number was 129,002, being 239,486 in the last fifteen months. From May to December, 1847, there were 53,180 Germans, and 52,496 natives of Ireland; but from December to August, 1848, the number from Ireland has exceeded by some thousands those of Germany. This is owing, no doubt, to the war between Denmark and Germany.

Gen. Gaines has issued a long general order in New York, on resuming the command of the eastern division of the army, and tenders to the troops returned from Mexico his cordial congratulations. He speaks of war and slavery as great evils, but which have nevertheless contributed to civilization. He adds that he has been a warrior and slaveholder because he loved peace; and that both evils will disappear in the coming century if the American people do their duty.

Several years ago, Mr. Ellet, the successful engineer of the Niagara suspension bridge, proposed to the citizens of St. Louis, to construct a similar bridge across the Mississippi at that place. The possibility of achieving such an undertaking was then doubted, and the matter was dropped; but, now that the Niagara bridge has been complete, attention is seriously directed to Mr. Ellet's proposition by the people of St. Louis.

A meeting of the Newark (N. J.) Anti-Slavery Society was dispersed the other evening, by a crowd of men and boys, who rushed into the room, and commenced yelling, upsetting the benches, &c., and not content with this, they took the books belonging te the Society, carried them into the street and burned them.

Illinois and Missouri are at present in a hostile attitude to each other. The harbor of St. Louis being in danger of filling up by sediment, an attempt to fill up the channel between Bloody Island and the Missouri shore was made. An injunction was taken out against the operation in Illinois, but the St. Louis people not obeying, a cannon was brought down to the shore by the Sheriff of St. Clair county, to oblige the workmen to desist. Such a powerful argument was succeesful.

After the steamship Columbus had got to sea, on her last trip from Charleston, S. C., to this port, a colored man, who proved to be a runaway slave, was found concealed among the rigging in the locker. The vessel, to avoid the severe penalty to which she was liable, put into Wilmington, N. C., ond had the fugitive sent back to Charleston, in the steamer Vanderbilt.

It is estimated that the harvest of the United States this season is sufficient to feed half the people on the globe, abundantly. With scarcely an exception, every species of grain, fruit, and vegetable, is yielding throughout the country an extraordinary crop. Of beef, pork, butter, cheese, &c., the same plenty abounds, and while our population are secure of every comfort and luxury in the way of food, we shall have a surplus sufficient to meet all the famine that may occur in the Old World.

The pernicious practice of opium eating appears to be alarmingly on the increase in England, and is evidently extending to all ranks of society. By the reports of the Board of Trade down to the 5th of May, 1848, it is shown that the consumption of opium has been doubled in England in one year. The imports of this drug for the past year amounted to 24,929 lbs.

THE STRANGER ON THE SILL.

BY T. BUCHANAN READ.

Between the broad fields of wheat and corn,
Is the lowly home where I was born;
The peach tree leans against the wall,
And the woodbine wanders over all;
There is the shaded door-way still,
But a stranger's foot has crossed the sill.

There is the barn—and, as of yore,
I can smell the hay from the open door,
And see the busy swallows throng,
And hear the pee-wee's mournful song;
But the stranger comes—O! painful proof—
His sheaves are piled to the heated roof.

There is the orchard—the very trees
Where my childhood knew long hours of ease,
And watched the shadowy moments run
Till my life imbibed more shade than sun;
The swing from the bough still sweeps the air,
But the stranger's children are swinging there.

There bubbles the shady spring below,
With its bulrush brook where the hazels grow;
'T was there I found the calamus root,
And watched the minnows poise and shoot,
And heard the robin lave his wing—
But the stranger's bucket is at the spring.

O, ye who daily cross the sill,
Step lightly, for I love it still;
And when you crowd the old barn eves,
Then think that countless harvest sheaves
Have passed within that scented door,
To gladden the eyes that are no more.

Deal kindly with these orchard trees;
And when your children crowd their knees,
Their sweetest fruit they shall impart,
As if old memories stirred their heart;
To youthful sport still leave the swing,
And in sweet reverence hold the spring.

The barn, the trees, the brook, the birds,
The meadows with their lowing herds;
The woodbine on the cottage wall—
My heart still lingers with them all.
Ye strangers on my native sill,
Step lightly, for I love it still.

A THRILLING NARRATIVE.

The following narration of the loss of a whale-ship by fire, and the subsequent suffering of the crew in the boats, was furnished to a Rio Janeiro paper by the captain :—

The ship "Cassandra" Henry Winslow, master, sailed from Providence on the 19th of November, 1847, on a whaling cruise. Nothing occurred worthy of remark until the 1st of May, 1848, between 4 and 5 A. M. it blowing a moderate gale from north-west at the time, the alarming cry of "fire" was heard. All hands were instantly on deck, and it was soon discovered the fire was in the lower hold, apparently near the foremast, where four barrels of tar had been stowed; it was also discovered that two of the crew—negroes from the coast of Africa, had jumped overboard; I hove a rope's end to one of them, but he refused to take it, and sunk out of sight. Orders were instantly given, and every exertion made to extinguish the fire and save the ship, but the fire being in the lower hold, and the smoke so dense and the flames so rapid that none could enter the between decks, our efforts proved unavailing.

Attempts were then made to procure bread and water, but the smoke in the steerage was so dense as to prevent us—this led us to believe that the ship had been fired aft as well as forward. Three boats were lowered, with the customary boat kegs of water, a small quantity of bread, some raw meat, taken from the harness cask, my nautical instruments, and a few articles of clothing.

Shortly after leaving the ship the second mate's boat picked up one of the Africans who had jumped overboard when the alarm of fire was first given. He afterward confessed that his companion had fired the ship, and then plunging a knife in his side jumped overboard, and that he was his accomplice. He gave as their reason for acting as they did, their fears that they would be sold as slaves at the first port we entered. I hope it is not necessary for me to say their fears were without the shadow of a foundation.

Being now daylight, it was found that all the ship's company except the African were in the three boats, in all 23 souls. We found our supplies to be two boat-kegs and one tea-kettle, in all about ten gallons of water, about 15 pounds of bread and some raw meat. According to the previous day's reckoning we were in lat. 34 deg. 30 min. South, long. 45.50 West—400 miles from the nearest land. No one who has never been in a similar situation can appreciate the sufferings that succeeded. Confined to one gill of water and a small portion of bread a day, in bad weather, and obliged to pull against the wind, we soon became exhausted and had to trust to our sails, heading as nearly towards the land as we could.

Nothing of importance occurred until the morning of the 5th, (lat. 32, long. 47,) when, about 10 A. M., we discovered a sail; all hands took to the oars, and after pulling and making signals of distress for five hours, we came up with her, and found her to be a Spanish brig, 100 days from Barcelona, bound to Montevideo. He made every effort to get away from us; the mate's boat came up with her first, the captain would not let him come alongside, but gave him a rope and towed him some distance astern. I then came alongside, and though an interpreter stated my distressed circumstances, and asked permission for me and my crew to come on board—he refused most positively. I then begged him to take us to Montevideo, or St. Catherine's or one or two days' sail toward land. He refused.

I asked him to let us come on board for one night then, that we might get some sleep and rest, to enable us to bear the fatigue and hardship consequent on a renewal of our voyage. This also he refused. He gave us some bread, wine, and water, and then passed a pencil and piece of paper down to me to write the name of my ship, that he might report me. I refused to write it unless permitted to come on board, and, against his express wishes, jumping into the main chains I went on board. He asked me if he could do anything more for me. I told him nothing but take us on board. This of course he refused, and I left him. Thank God, such instances of "man's inhumanity to man" are rare, very rare, among seafaring men, and Capt. Dominick, of the brig "Alercidita," will have the satisfaction of knowing he stands "alone in his glory."

We again made sail and proceeded, without accident, until the night of the 6th, when it commenced blowing very heavy in squalls; hove the boats to until daylight, by making a line fast to the oars and paying them out ahead. At daylight again made sail, until 11 o'clock, when it began to blow a heavy gale from N. to N. E., and we were compelled to heave to. About 4 P. M. my boat was swamped, and we were left to the mercy of the sea. We supported ourselves by the capsized boat until the two remaining boats came to our relief, when all, 8 in number, were saved. By this accident I lost my nautical instruments, and all my water. The two remaining boats now contained 23 persons, and their gunwales were not more than six or eight inches out of water. In this situation we passed the night; nothing was heard save the awful roaring of the tempest and occasionally the voices of some of the officers and crew offering up a prayer to the Almighty Ruler of wind and wave for their safety. He heard our prayers. In the morning the wind moderated, and the sea was beaten down by a heavy shower of rain. From this time we had fine weather and proceeded toward the land, where we arrived 5 P. M., 10th of May, on the beach near Conventas, in the Province of St. Catherine, Brazil, nearly exhausted, having no water and very little food left.

The mate's boat was capsized in the surf on landing, and Barney Reed, a boat-steerer, was drowned, he being so weak as to be unable to extricate himself from the surf. Near where we landed we discovered a house, at which we were furnished with water and provisions.

Two days after, I left for St. Catherine's, to give notice to and ask assistance from the United States Cousul there. Shortly after I left, the negro either deserted or was stolen; most probably he met the fate, his fears of which were the cause of so much suffering.

APPEARANCE OF THE COUNTRY IN ENGLAND.

BY REV. W. BELLOWS.

April 28.—We had our first view of the face of England to-day, in a ride on a stage-coach from Warwick to Oxford. The distance is forty-five miles, and was accomplished in five hours and a half, including at least an hour's stoppage. Nothing can exceed the charm of a drive through this lovely country in the spring time, over the roads as smooth as a floor, behind horses as fleet as stags, between hedges green as new grass and white with blossoms; in view of thatched cottages, ivy-clad village churches, grey with moss and time, with the familiar features of the Old England of the story books, and the drawing-master's gable end, tumble-down wandering picture-houses, all "large as life, and twice as natural," full before you! There is but one word descriptive of English scenery—England is one great garden. Everybody says so, because nobody can say any thing more or less. We found the grounds about Eaton Hall, concerning which much is said, no finer than the general appearance of the country wherever we went. It all looks much like the immediate neighborhood of Boston. Many slopes of gentle hill-sides, or stretches of meadow, reminded us vividly of the undulations of Roxbury and Brookline, and the banks of the Charles, which is a very good sample of an English river, of the largest size. To an American eye, accustomed only to the beginnings or progress of things, it is very delightful to come upon a country that is finished. The order, plan, and cultivation of English ground, seems perfect. You may ride fifty miles and not see one neglected plot of land, one broken-down fence, one new building, one make-shift device. But amid all this perfection of agriculture, all this order and solidity and finish of structure, it is painful to see how little room the people take up, how inferior their accommodations are; how small a feature the homes of the million form in the landscape. The dwellings or those who cultivate this soil, are hardly higher than the hedges, and wear the look of stone sheds, or places for farming tools. Seeing the marks of so thick a population in the tillage, the traveler looks around for the farm-houses, which, in America, would so prominently enliven and distinguish the landscape; but in England the common people dwell in cots that make a surprisingly small figure in the prospect, and give the agricultural districts almost the appearance of being uninhabited. We could not help continually asking, where are the people, and where do they live, who did all this work?

THE FIVE PEACHES.

A peasant returning from the city brought home with him five peaches, the most beautiful ones which he could find. It was the first time his children had ever seen this fruit. Therefore they admired them and were delighted with their red cheeks and delicate down. The father then divided them among his four children, reserving one for their mother.

At evening, before the children went into their sleeping room, their father asked them, "Well, how have the peaches tasted?"

"Deliciously, dear father," said the eldest. "They are fine fruit, so juicy and sweet. I have carefully kept the stone, and I will plant it and rear a tree."

"Good," replied the father; "that is acting prudently, and caring for the future as becomes a farmer."

"I ate mine up at once, and threw away the stone," said the youngest, "and mother gave me half of hers."

"Well," said the father, "you have not acted very wisely, but still natural and like a child. Wisdom will come by-and-by."

The second son then said—"I picked up the stone which little brother threw away, and cracked it. There was a kernel in it just like a nut. But I sold my peach, and received for it money enough to buy twelve when I go to the city."

The father shook his head and said—"It was wisely done, indeed, but it was not natural nor child-like. I think you are destined to be a merchant."

"And you, Edmund?" asked the father. Edmund frankly and carelessly answered, "I carried my peach to our neighbor's son, the sick George, who is ill of a fever. He refused to take it. Then I laid it upon his bed and came home."

"Well," said the father, "and who has made the best use of his peach?"

Then all three cried out—"Brother Edmund!"

But Edmund was silent, and his mother embraced him with tears in her eyes.

A FATHER'S LOVE.

Some feelings are to mortals given,
With less of earth in them than Heaven,
And if there be a human tear
From passion's dross refined and clear,
A tear so limpid and so meek
It would not stain an angel's cheek,
'Tis that which pious fathers shed
Upon a duteous daughter's head. [Scott.

We have read these lines many times. We have repeated them, and meditated upon them, until we could almost see the limpid tears falling upon the cheek of some fair girl. There is beautiful sweetness in this truly poetic thought, which touches a tender chord in every sympathizing bosom. It is a gem sparkling with sentiment and feeling refined and spiritual.

The father's love for his daughter seems more pure, more exalted, than his love for a son. She is the mother's counsel—the mother's assistant; and when the wife has gone to that it is the daughter who takes her place, who wipes away a father's tear and cheers the desponding heart by kind attentions. It is she who watches over her young brothers and sisters—who imparts to them those lessons a mother taught her when a child. The father regards such a being as more than a daughter, and if any feelings have "less of earth in them than heaven," it is those with which he watches her self-sacrificing devotion and faithfulness. She a is treasure dear as the heart's warm blood, and the affection she merits justly entitles her to

Bourne whence no traveler e'er returns,

A tear so limped and so meek,
It would not stain an angel's cheek. [Tem. Stan.

ANCIENT METALS.—Of the use of these, the Scriptures make very early mention. In the days of Moses, gold is spoken of as put, and sometimes kept in a liquid state, while it is beyond our power to reduce it to a powder. The corners of the stones of the pyramids are so sharp as to break the skin of the hand when passed over them, and so hard as to resist the sharpest steel. The French found great difficulty in carving two lines upon the obelisk now in La Place Concorde; yet the ancients had covered all the façades with figures. According to history, they had an art, now lost, of making copper, (one of the softest of all metals) harder than steel, and it was of this they made their tools. The famous Delhi Blades, as it is well known, are unrivalled. They would cut off the heads of a row of hob nails placed one after another without dulling their edge; and were yet so pliable that the point could be made to touch the handle. Then the warrior, too impatient to wait for his sword to be cooled in the usual way, snatched it red hot, and waving it in the air, thus gave it its temper. They tried in Paris lately, thus to temper their steel, but without success. Scott gives a description of the swords of Richard, which cut down steel with the same facility. The cannons of the British in India, it is well known, soon became honey-combed by the dampness of the dew, and to be totally useless in war. The lines of Byron, on the rust upon the steel of the warriors, are according to truth, though that warrior had lain but one night beneath the open sky. Necessity has been to the East Indian, the mother of invention. He will take the cast off hoop of an English cask, and make of it a sword equal to the best Prussian blade. The pliability of the steel of the ancients was wonderful, but that of their bronze was more so.

IMPROVED PLANTING MACHINE.—Mr. Robert Crisswell, residing at Buena Vista, Franklin Co., Pa., has invented a new and ingenious machine, combining a plough and planting machine, and answering alike for corn, potatoes, &c. It is so constructed as to score out two rows at a time, for either corn or potatoes, to drop and cover them as it passes along, dropping at any required distance apart, and covering to any required depth, and by a peculiar arrangement, the rows are at once kept straight and parallel. As the hoppers drop opposite and at the same time, corn can be planted so that it can be farmed both ways, without the necessity of scoring the ground out in the opposite direction previous to planting. By this means one man and team can plant from twelve to fifteen acres per day, whereas, it would require four men and teams to score that number of acres both ways, and eight or ten persons to plant and cover them in the ordinary way. After planting, the hoppers, wheels, &c., can be taken off, and the plow remains with which double the amount of labor can be performed, that a common plough will do. [F'r. & Mec.

A GREAT LITTLE TOWN.—It is a remarkable circumstance, says an exchange, that the little town of Westmoreland, Va., which lies on the Potomac, about seventy miles below Washington, and has only about 206 voters, is said to have produced two Presidents of the United States; three Judges of the Supreme Court; three Governors, and three Revolutionary Generals. It is the birth place of General Washington, Mr Monroe, of Arthur Lee the first Minister to France—of Chief Justice Marshall, and Judge Washington—of Henry Lee, the great orator of the first Congress, and who, but for the illness of his wife, was to have written the Declaration of Independence.

HISSING NOSES.—The Rev. Thomas P. Hunt was once lecturing, when a number of rowdies, who were present, attempted to hiss him down. Mr. H., as every one knows, is not easily scared off the track, and instead of being intimidated by this goose-like method of augumentation, he addressed the noisy ones as follows:

"Who are those persons attempting to disturb the meeting? Who are they? Oh, I see now. They are some red nosed rummies, and they always hiss just so, when I dip their noses in cold water."

Mr. Hunt was never again troubled with hissing in that region.

NEW USE OF THE TOMATO.—The Cheraw (S. C.) Gazette states that, in addition to the advantages of the tomato for table use, the vine is of great value for food for cattle, especially for cows. It is said that a cow fed on tomato vines will give more milk and yield butter of a finer flavor, and in greater abundance, than any other long-feed ever tried. It is thought, too, that more good food for cattle, and at less expense, can be raised on a given quantity of ground planted in tomatoes, than from any other vegetable known to the Southern country.

TEMPERANCE IN THE EAST.—The last report of the Boston Parent W. T. Abstinence Society shows, that since the formation of the Society (in April, 1841) 57,381 persons have signed its pledge at its various meetings, and at its hall; and from the best information obtained, by inquiry and a rigid examination, less than ten per cent. of this number have forsaken their allegiance to the pledge; thus leaving more than 50, 000—residents in this city and other places—who still enjoy the blessings of a life of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks. Of this number, according to the best means of information possessed, something more than 1,000 have united themselves with the various churches in the city and its vicinity—showing, so far as this number is concerned, that their reform did not end in signing the pledge. At meetings during the year, 1,531 have signed the pledge of total abstinence. During the year, 511 persons have been lodged.

VARIETY.

A Methodist and a Quaker were traveling in company, when the Quaker reproved the Methodist for their boisterous manner of worship. "Why," said he, "we can take more pleasure in our private rooms of meditation, where we think of nothing worldly during our stay." "Sir," said the Methodist, "if you will take a private room, stay one hour, and when you return, say that you have thought of nothing worldly, I will give you my horse," which proposal was accepted. After the time had expired his friend asked him if he claimed the horse. "Why," said he, "I could not help thinking what I should do for a saddle to ride him home with."

The Scientific American says that a fearful tempest and curious phenomena occurred at Bromberg, in Prussia, on the 18th of June, during which masses of electrical fire like broad sheets of flame encircled the steeples, towers, and chimnies. In a moment they would blaze with lurid flame, and the next be buried up in murky darkness. The thunder was like roaring artillery and the rain like deafening rushing cataracts. Lofty towers and piercing spires were hurried from their foundations and buried in the earth, and the city is now one mass of ruins.

A woman went one day to hear Dr. —— preach, and, as usual, carried a pocket Bible with her, that she might turn to any of the passages the preacher might happen to refer to. But she found that she had no use for her Bible there; and on coming away, said to a friend, 'I should have left my Bible at home to-day, and have brought my dictionary. The doctor does not deal in scripture, bnt in such learned words and phrases as to require the help of an interpreter to render them intelligible.'

"Is a man and his wife both one?" asked the wife of a certain red-eyed gentleman, who in a state of stupefaction was holding his aching head with both hands. "Yes, I suppose so," was the reply. "Well then," said she, "I came home drunk last night, and ought to be ashamed of myself." This backhanded rebuke from a long-suffering, but affectionate wife, effectually cured him of his brutish propensity.

Mr. Adams was once asked, what he lamented most in his life. "My impetuous temper and vituperous manner of speech," said he, "which prevents me from returning good for evil, and induces me, in the madness of my blood, to say things that afterwards I am ashamed of."

On a very wet day in the west of Scotland, an English traveler inquired peevishly of a native, whether it always rained in that country." "No," replied the Highlander dryly, "it sometimes snows."

"How," said Mr. Munsel to Mr. Yates, "do you accomplish so much in so short a time? Have you any particular plan?" "I have. When I have any particular thing to do I go and do it."

Sound beams, formed of the wood of mulberry tree, have been found in the ruins of Ninevah, where they are supposed to have been placed at least seven hundred years before Christ!

When a young man has a love for reading, and of course a healthful relish for intellectual pleasures, he has become possessed of one of the best preservatives against dissipation.

Nature teaches us that we are all dependant, that we are like cog-wheels, pushing each other along by filling up mutual voids.

There is a want of simplicity, and nobleness about a great person whose condescensions is fully felt at the time.

New York city is now second only to London and Paris, of all the cities of Europe. London has a population of 2,000,000; Paris 1,000,000; New York over 500,000.

Gen. Sam Houston and Gen. Rusk, Senators from Texas, on their way home, were robbed on a steamer at the Cincinnati wharf, together, of about $60 and a watch. The thieves got into their state-room, and "reveled in hauls," to the contentment of their desires.

The annual shower of falling stars appeared on the 11th ult., to the New Haven observers, who counted 475 in the course of two hours and a half.

The ship Serampore recently cleared at the Boston Custom House for the Sandwich Islands with an assorted cargo valued at $89,182, including some $15,000 worth of domestics.

The city of Manchester, N. H., at a legal meeting on the 19th ult., decided by a vote of 397 to 20, to surrender their city charter and go back to a town organization.

In Boston there are 257 physicians, besides eight female practitioners, registered in the Directory, and eighteen Thomsonian practitioners in various parts of the city.

A large agricultural meeting has been held in England, and a Mr. Slocum awarded a medal for the introduction of agricultural tools from the United States.

A mechanic in Wilmington, Delaware, has invented a cast-iron saddle, which is represented to be both excellent and cheap.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

BOARD OF INSTRTCTION.

W. C. KENYON, A. M., } Principals.
IRA SAYLES, A. M., }

Assisted by nine able and experienced Teachers, five in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past ten years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to also continue to merit a share of public patronage

Extensive buildings are now erected for the accommodation of students, and for Recitation and Lecture Rooms, &c. They occupy an eligible position, and are finished in the best style of modern architecture; and the different apartments are heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical

Ladies and Gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board and rooms can also be had in private families, if particularly desired.

Each room for those who board in the Hall is furnished with a bed and bedding, a table, two chairs, and a pail.

The plan of instruction adopted in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the student, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The Health, the Manners, and the Morals of our Students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

REGULATIONS.

1. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.
2. Punctuality in attending all regular Academic exercises will be required.
3. The use of Tobacco, for chewing or smoking, will not be allowed either in or about the Academic buildings.
4. Playing at games of chance cannot be allowed.
5. Using profane language cannot be allowed.
6. The use of any kind of intoxicating drinks cannot be allowed, unless prescribed in case of sickness, by a regular physician.
7. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, cannot be permitted.
8. Gentlemen and ladies of the Institution will not be permitted to visit the rooms of the opposite sex, except in cases of imperious necessity, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.
9. Good order must be maintained at all times, and in all the rooms and halls of the Institution, and in all the intercourse of students with each other.
10. All students are required to retire regularly at the ringing of the bell designated for that purpose, as occasion may require; and to rise at the ringing of the morning bell, also designated.
11. Any room, occupied by students, will, at all times, be subject to the visitation of the Teachers of the Institution, who are required to see that the regulations are complied with.
12. Students will be required to keep their own rooms in good order, and to pay all unnecessary damages, either of rooms or of furniture furnished with the rooms.

REGULAR ACADEMIC EXERCISES.

The regular exercises, at which all the students will be required to attend, unless specially excused, are, Chapel exercises each morning during the term; Recitations, from two to four, five days each week, from Monday morning till Friday evening. Compositions and Declamations, one-half day, once in two weeks, Literary, Scientific, and Moral Lectures by the Principals. Public Worship, once in each week, either on Saturday or Sunday, according as the students may be in the habit of keeping the Sabbath, either on the seventh or first day of the week.

GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the students will be in the hands of the Principals, and will be strictly and steadily exercised, and at the same time, strictly parental. The object of our academic government being to secure the greatest possible amount of physical, intellectual, and moral good to the students themselves, regularity and order of exercises, and good and wholesome citizens to society. No unwarrantable means will be made use of to enforce the observance of the above regulations; yet our constant endeavor will be, to make the means resorted to as effective as humun means may be.

Parents who place their children in this Institution, and all students who are sufficiently old to understand the necessity of order, cannot be too well assured that the foregoing regulations form the most essential part of the contract between them and us; and that whatever student wantonly violates them, and shows himself incorrigibly determined on pursuing his waywardness, will be expelled from the privileges of the Institution, and will not be permitted to re-enter it again, without special proof of reformation. Nor will an expelled student have any deduction made from full term charges.

Farther, parents are requested not to place money for expenses, in the hands of students who are not old enough to use money with discretion and economy. Either of the Principals, or the Book-keeper of the Institution, will act as fiscal guardian of such students without charge.

ADMISSION.

Candidates for admission as students, must present testimonials of good moral character, or be known to possess such a character, and must be willing to comply unreservedly with the foregoing regulations; and no one will be permitted to receive instructions in any class, until all academic bills, for the term in prospect, be paid or satisfactorily arranged.

ACADEMIC TERMS.

The Academic Year for 1848–9 consists of three terms, as follows:

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1848, and ending Thursday, November 23, 1848.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, December 5, 1848, and ending Thursday, March 15, 1849.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, April 3, 1849, and ending July 12, 1849.

As the plan of instruction in this Institution, laid out for each class, will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue through the term, and accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the terms.

N. B. Students who are expecting to teach during the winter or summer, will specify such intention on entering in the beginning of the fall or spring term; and, for the special accommodation of such, a day will be set apart at first, on which they can leave, if they wish; and they will not be permitted to leave on any other day, nor will any other than teachers be permitted to leave on the day specified.

Farther, it is of the utmost importance that the student be present at the day of the opening of the term, as on that and the succeeding day, the students entering are examined and classified.

It is also suggested to parents who patronize this Institution from the distance of a few miles around, that students should go home only once during the term, as every absence from classes is always attended with disadvantages to the student. This is a suggestion, and not imperative. But to meet this suggestion, the exercise of the school will close at noon on the seventh Friday in each term, and open again on the afternoon of Monday following.

THE JUDGES JUDGED—NO. 7.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE DECISION.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has decided that their Sunday law, "is essentially but a civil enactment." "Its sole mission is to inculcate a temporary weekly cessation from labor; but it adds not to this requirement any religious obligation." "The selection of the day of rest is but a question of expediency"—but "a civil regulation made for the government of man as a member of society." "It cannot be said, a primary object of the Act was, authoritatively, to assert the supremacy of Sunday as of divine appointment." "The State may without impropriety interfere to fix the time." "The command to abstain from labor is addressed to every citizen, irrespective of religious belief." Every one of these propositions, we extract verbatim from the published "Opinion." Of course they are good authority in the State of Pennsylvania. Well, now, this is the best thing the State authorities of Pennsylvania have ever done touching the Sunday question! Whether wittingly or not, they have done a great service to the cause of truth. They have affirmed the same propositions which the hierarchists of Europe have made before them. Neander says, "Sunday was always only a human institution." Archbishop Cranmer says, "We observe the Sunday, and certain other days, as the magistrates do judge convenient, whom we ought in this thing to obey." Seventh-day Baptists and Jews have long affirmed that Sunday, alias the Lord's day, alias the Christian Sabbath, derived all its authority from kings, courts, and councils. Now it is so decided, and put on permanent record in the highest court in Pennsylvania. Heretofore the disputants of Sunday sanctity have been browbeaten by references to the standing authorities of our land. Here is the authority of the highest court in a great State, "after much reflection," when the question was submitted to it! This will do. It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good. The Court has decided against our persecuted brethren in Pennsylvania; but it has so decided as to confirm and exalt before the people truths of great practical consequence to all the observers of the seventh day in their future efforts to get rid of the thraldom of religious despotism. Our Presbyterian brethren are the only religious sect in the land who take ecclesiastical action to obtain, from the Legislatures of our States, laws for coercing the people to the Sunday observance. To them we would especially commend the string of propositions which introduce this article. They believe in the magistrates having authority in matters of religion; they must surely admit these, coming from the highest Court in their pet State, and that "after much reflection" upon the very subject! The Court has doubtless put it upon the only ground on which they judged it safe for the magistrate to enforce the law upon Sunday workers. If we might whisper in the ears of the Executive Committee of the American and Foreign Sabbath Union, we would advise them to publish the "Opinion" verbatim in the next Permanent Sabbath Document, and it will no doubt do good. It will form a just counterpart of the dollar-and-cent arguments, and profit-and-loss considerations, contained in their addresses to Canal Commissioners, and Railroad Directors, adopted and sent out from the National Sabbath Convention held at Baltimore. The arguments of the Court are most surely the legitimate consequences of those addresses circulated with so much zeal and commendable liberality; and it is certainly just for the friends of those measures to take home to themselves the benefits thereof.

Another consequence of this decision, we hope, will be allowed to accrue to ourselves. Heretofore, whenever we have applied to the State Legislature for relief from Sunday restraint, certain interested persons have taught our legislators that they could not relieve us without violating a "fundamental, permanent, universal, moral law." Now be it known, hereafter, that the Supreme Court has decided otherwise; it is no such thing! It is "established by common consent," a "civil regulation," "a question of expediency;" the time is fixed "by the legislative power of the State without impropriety." It is very easy to see, now that this point is thus authoritatively settled, how "strong the argument might be felt when addressed to the Legislature as a reason for the modification of the statute." We must certainly regard the Court as friendly to such a movement by their condescending to put these arguments in our mouths. Should we deem it best to act upon this friendly intimation of the Court, we beseech all parties to hold fast to the decision which the Court has published. Being now put upon record, and that in establishing a former decision of the same Court in a similar case, the maxim stare decisis requires that all concerned should quietly abide the decision. Nothing can be plainer in the world than that the legislative power which interferes to fix this civil regulation, can interfere to unfix it. Farther, as the statute "adds not my religious obligation," it would be taking none away to repeal it, or so to modify it as to relieve Jews and seventh-day Christians. No proposition in Euclid is clearer than this: If a plus adds nothing to C. S., take plus a away, and it leaves C. S. whole. If the "Act of Assembly of 1705, and the Act of 22d of April, 1794," confers "no superior religious position upon those who worship upon the first day of the week, (and so the Judge decides,) repeal it, and it will take none from them! If "the law intends no preference," let it be repealed, and Sunday can lose no preference from the State. "A portion of our citizens belonging to a respectable Christian sect," believe it to be unconstitutional, because it invades conscience, and takes away a portion of their civil rights, and gives a power to wretched men who follow the business of informers on Sunday, saying, "Let us lurk privily for the innocent without cause; let us swallow them up alive as the grave, and whole as those that go down into the pit: we shall find all precious substance; we shall fill our houses with spoil." It is surely a serious thing for the State authorities to cast in their lot among them, and "all have one purse!"—a purse filled with the gains of persecution! Yet such is an unavoidable consequence of the enactment and confirming of the Sunday statute. "To say the object of the Legislature was to assert the sanctity of the particular day selected, is to say nothing in proof of the—constitutionality of the Act, unless in this the religious conscience of others has not been offended, and their rights invaded"—the very thing complained of in carrying the case to the Supreme Court.

Another important consequence growing out of this decision, is, that being but a civil regulation, the Legislature is bound by the Constitution of the State, and of the nation, to make it bear equally upon all classes of citizens. Its present operation is as unequal as five dollars are to six, or two hundred and sixty to three hundred and twelve per annum. The constitutions specially give equal privileges and immunities to citizens individually. It is a just immunity to release the citizens observing the first day of the week as a Sabbath, from all public civil duties on that day. But is it not equally just that they who observe the seventh day of the week as a Sabbath should be released from all public civil duties on the day they so observe? By what right can the authorities of Pennsylvania make so invidious a distinction between the citizens of the State, as is made between first-day and seventh-day people? If the Constitutions guarantee equal privileges to all citizens observing the first day as a Sabbath, to pursue business and labor on those six days of the week which they believe to be working days, why do they not equally guarantee to those observing the seventh day as a Sabbath, to pursue business and labor on the six days of the week which they believe to be working days? Can any one give us a satisfactory constitutional answer to this question? It is our opinion, that the State of Pennsylvania is liable to an action for damages, by their infraction of our organic laws on the persons and estates of Jews and Seventh-day Baptists. At a moderate calculation, the State of Pennsylvania takes away from every seventh-day Sabbath keeper fifty-two dollars per annum; and we suppose, at least, that there are two thousand such persons in that State! A hundred and four thousand dollars per annum, recovered of the State of Pennsylvania, would be but a poor compensation for the injury which these persons are sustaining from the operation of the Sunday laws. It could never pay for the offences offered to their consciences, and the indignities done to their persons and characters by the persecutions they have suffered.

The operation of the Sunday laws is seriously endangering our religious liberties. Had the question of our rights been submitted to the framers of our national Constitution, or to the Courts that sat in those times, we cannot entertain a doubt but that our rights would have been honestly awarded us; nay, they were so awarded in the only cases of which we have heard occurring at that time. That statutory provision was not made for us at that time, is easily explained. First, Sabbatarians were few and unmolested, and they were disposed to trust to progressive liberty infused into American institutions. Secondly, the legislators of those times were disposed to indulge the prepossessions of the people, where there was no immediate clashing with any one's rights, trusting to time and the working of liberal principles to correct the unharmonious working of the statutory with the organic laws. Mr. Hamilton holds the following language on this point in the Federalist;—"The enaction of a new government, whatever care or wisdom may distinguish the work, cannot fail to originate questions of intricacy and nicety." "Time only can mature and perfect so compound a system, liquidate the meaning of all its parts, and adjust them to each other in a harmonious and consistent whole." Several important questions which were then trusted to the people on these premises, now assume a shape before the people, which shows that there is a strong tendency in the selfishness of human nature, to fall back to arbitrary principles when not pressed by external circumstances. Our liberties can only be preserved at the price of eternal vigilance. The religious rights of the people is one of these question. The present race of Judges, like the later Pharaoh's of Egypt, know not Joseph. They have grown up with the Sunday institutions standing side by side with other municipal regulations; and they feel averse to making inroads upon what has come to be considered established usage; and whoever suffers by it must take the consequences. "It is part of the common law of the land." Hence Judge Coulter affects to be surprised that it should be allowed by the Court to be "an open question." Why, we could tell the Judge that we suppose the rights of conscience are always to be considered an open question. Pro-slavery men had an overshadowing influence at the formation of our government, and now they claim the right to make the same eternal. The Sunday coercionists, who are chiefly Presbyterians, had sufficient influence with the early legislatures to induce them to retain and modify the old Puritan laws respecting Sunday, Lord's day, or the Christian Sabbath; and now they set up a claim that it is part of the common law of the land, and though it breed persecution as bitter as the Cotton Mather Code, when men and women were whipped and expatriated from the soil of Massachusetts for working on Sunday, "it is according to precedent, and for the establishment of conservative authority." "Why then should the Supreme Court not regard it as our forefathers regarded it?" To this question the Sabbatarians answer, that we live under a different form of government; we live under organic laws which recognize our mutual and indefeasible rights; such as the rights of conscience and uninterrupted pursuit of business and labor; and we suppose it was never intended that Puritan Judges should determine what conscience may hold sacred and what not. "The Christian, the Jew, the Mohammedan, and the Pagan, are alike entitled to protection." But if the Court may expound what is conscience-worthy and what is not, then there is no protection at all, but to Puritan Sunday-keepers. Was it ever expected that the Courts of Pennsylvania would feel conscientious on many points on which the Jew, the Mohammedan, or the Pagan Indian feels very conscientious? In our humble opinion, according to the Constitution, an Indian at his Pagan festival, with a pow-wow and a dance, is as much entitled to protection as the Christian observing the Lord's day. A Mohammedan giving his oath upon the Koran and the Prophet of God, is as much entitled to the benefits of our Courts as the Christian who kisses the New Testament. And the Jew or seventh-day Christian, secularizing the first day of the week in obedience to the law of Jehovah, is as much entitled to the protection and benefit of municipal law, as the observers of the first day are to the same when secularizing Jehovah's holy seventh-day Sabbath. The Constitutions "intend no preference." It matters not what the observance is, so long as it is not prejudicial to the public weal; no Court nor legislature has any right to interfere with it. By the public weal is meant the civil and property interests of society; not the religious predilections of one or more sects, who might agree together to say that "both men and beasts live longer, can do more work, and in a better manner, by observing the Christian Sabbath."

The operation of the Sunday law is as odious as any thing can well be. Pennsylvania has her Trenton, Reading, Lancaster, Columbia, Chambersburg, York and Wrightsville, Norristown, Germantown, and West Chester Railroads, and her numerous canals, all worked on the first day! Nobody sues these companies. It is because these huge bodies have no souls. But if a poor Jew shave a Christian citizen of Philadelphia on that day, or a poor Seventh-day Baptist cart a load of manure out of his own barnyard to his potato patch on Sunday, why some poor wretch who spends his Sunday in watching for them, goes to a (Presbyterian?) magistrate and informs, gets a summons, and then, with all the sanctity of "a civil regulation," he is put into the Puritan thumb-screws. And this thing is done by the men who join means to send Protestant lecturers through the length and breadth of the land to warn the people of the danger our liberties incur by the increase of Papists! What difference, whether our liberties be wrested from us by Papists or Presbyterians? It would not hurt our pockets, backs, nor consciences, to be fined, whipped, or imprisoned by Papist coercion, more than by Presbyterian coercion. A Protestant prison is as cold as a Catholic one; it is as hard to earn money to pay a Protestant fine, as it is to pay a Catholic one. It is as much against our consciences to be compelled to keep Sunday as it would be to be compelled to keep Christmas-day. Had shame any patrons at the present day, Protestants of the prevailing sects would rise and stop the persecution of Jews and Seventh-day Baptists, before they sent out any more railers against Catholics. But having grown up beyond the reach of arbitrary laws themselves, they care not for the sufferings of a few Jews and Seventh-day Baptists. We are a great nation, proclaiming liberty to the mighty, and bondage to the weak! So did the Tudors, the Stuarts, and the Bourbons! Where are they now? S. D.

PERSEVERANCE UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

The late Professor Heyne, of Gottingen, was one of the greatest classical scholars of his own or any other age; yet he had spent the first thirty-three years of his life, not only in obscurity, but in almost incessant struggle with depressing poverty. He had been born indeed amongst the lowest indigence, his father being a poor weaver with a large family, for whom his best exertions were often unable to provide bread. In the memoirs of his own life, Heyne says:—"Want was the earliest companion of my childhood. I well remember the painful impression made on my mind by witnessing the distress of my mother when without food for her children. How often have I seen her, on a Saturday evening, weeping and wringing her hands as she returned from an unsuccessful effort to sell the goods which the daily and nightly toils of my father had manufactured." His parents sent him to a child's school. Having learned everything comprised in the usual course of the school, he felt a desire to learn Latin. A son of the school-master was willing to teach him at the rate of fourpence a week; but the difficulty of paying so large a sum seemed insurmountable. One day he was sent to his god-father, who was a baker, in pretty good circumstances, for a loaf. As he went along, he pondered sorrowfully on this great object of his wishes, and entered the shop in tears. The good-tempered baker, on learning the cause of his grief, undertook to pay the required fee for him—at which Heyne tells us he was perfectly intoxicated with joy, and he ran, all ragged and barefooted, through the streets, tossing the loaf in the air, it slipped from his hand, rolling into the gutter. This accident, and a sharp reprimand from his father, who could ill afford such a loss, brought him to his senses. What sustained his courage in these circumstances (we use his own words) was neither ambition nor presumption, nor even the hope of one day taking his place among the learned. The stimulus that incessantly spurred him on, was the feeling of humiliation of his condition, the shame with which he shrunk from the thought of that condition which the want of a good education would impose upon him—above all, the determined resolution of battling courageously with fortune. He was resolved to try, he said, whether she had thrown him among the dust, he would not be able to rise by his own efforts. His ardor for study only allowed him two nights' sleep in the week; and all the while his god-father (not the good tempered baker, but another, a well endowed but parsimonious Churchman) scarcely ever wrote to him but to inveigh against his indolence—often actually addressing his letters on the outside, "To M. Heyne, idler, at Liepsic."

HEBER'S PRAYER FOR HIS COUNTRY.

From foes that would the land devour;
From guilty pride, and lust of power;
From wild sedition's lawless hour;
From mental slavery—

From blinded zeal by faction led;
From giddy change by fancy bred;
From poisonous error's serpent head;
Good Lord, preserve us free!

Defend, oh God! with guardian hand,
The laws and ruler of our land,
And grant our church thy grace, to stand
In faith and unity.

The Spirit's help of thee we crave,
That thou, whose blood was shed to save,
May'st at thy second coming have
A flock to welcome thee!

CHINESE SUPERSTITION.

There is no state religion in China; but large sums of money are received by priests who exercise a profitable trade by divining the fortunes of those who resort to their temples to consult their destiny, or to know the result of any important undertaking. According to the Chinese Repository there are 1,560 temples dedicated to Confucius alone; and 62,606 pigs, rabbits, sheep, and deer, and 27,000 pieces of silk, are annually presented on their altars. But it not unfrequently happens that these offerings fail to produce the desired effect. The expedients then resorted to are both ludicrous and melancholy.

In 1835 the Prefect of Canton, on occasion of a distressing drought of eight months, issued the following invitation, which would have better befitted a chieftan of the Bechuanas: "Pwan, acting Prefect of Kwang-chau, issues this inviting summons. Since for a long time there has been no rain, and the prospects of drought continue, and supplications are unanswered, my heart is scorched with grief. In the whole province of Kwang-tung, are there no extraordinary persons who can force the dragon to send rain? Be it known to you, all ye soldiers and people, that if there be any one, whether of this or any other province, priest or such like, who can, by any craft or arts, bring down abundance of rain, I respectfully request him to ascend the altar (of the dragon) and sincerely and reverently pray. And after the rain has fallen, I will liberally reward him with money and tablets to make known his merits." This invitation called forth a Budhist priest as a "rain-maker," and the Prefect erected an altar for him before his own office, upon which the man, armed with cymbal and wand, for three days vainly repeated his incantations from morning to night, exposed barefooted to the hot sun, the butt of the jeering crowd. The unsuccessful efforts of the priest did not render the calamity less grievous, and their urgent necessities led the people to resort to every expedient to force their gods to send rain. The authorities forbade the slaughter of animals—or, in other words, a fast was proclaimed. To keep the hot winds out of the city, the southern gate was shut, and all classes flocked to the temples. It was estimated that on one day 20,000 persons went to a celebrated shrine of the goddess of Mercy, among whom were the Governor and Prefect and their suites, who all left their sedans and walked with the multitude. The Governor, as a last expedient, the day before rain came, intimated his intention of liberating all prisoners not charged with capital offences. As soon as the rain fell, the people presented thank-offerings, and the southern gate of the city was opened, accompanied by an odd ceremony of burning the tail of a live sow while the animal was held in a basket. Sometimes devotees become irritated against their gods, and resort to summary means to force them to hear their petitions. It is said that the Governor having gone repeatedly in a time of drought to the temple of the god of rain, in Canton, dressed in his burdensome robes, through the heat of a tropical sun, on one of his visits, said—"The god supposes I am lying when I beseech his aid; for how can he know, seated in cool niche in the temple, that the ground is parched and the sky hot?" Whereupon he ordered his attendants to put a rope around his neck and haul his godship out of doors, that he might see and feel the state of the weather for himself; after his excellency had been cooled in the temple the idol was reinstated in its shrine, and the good effect of this treatment considered to be fully proved by the copious showers which soon after fell.

When all other means fail, the Emperor, we are told, prays, and makes offerings to his gods for the desired object. [Athenæum.

THE AFFECTIONS.—"Were I in a desert," says the sympathetic Sterne, "I would find something in it to call forth my affections. If I could not do better, I would fasten them upon some sweet myrtle, or seek some melancholy cypress, and repose beneath its shades; I would carve my name upon them, and declare they were the loveliest trees throughout the desert. If their leaves withered, I would teach myself to mourn, and when they renewed their verdure, I would instinctively rejoice. The heart and the affections require to be called forth; and if we are so unfortunate as to be destitute of friends, we must endeavor to place them upon something that is sensible of our attachment; for to a mind endowed with feelings and sensibility, nothing can be so dreadful as a state of indifference."

NEW YORK AS IT IS.

We have often been tempted to try our hand at describing scenes which meet our eyes in the city, but no scenic representation, much less any pen, can adequately give to a stranger a true idea of the variety of fortunes and feelings which mark its dense population. It is a false idea that the poor suffer vastly more in the winter than in the summer. We are satisfied of this. Free air is a blessing from God, and thousands die here for want of it.

We were passing down B—— street, the other day, and saw a child sitting on the door-step of a hovel. He, mayhap, had known the trials of three years. He certainly had known a few of their joys. The heat was intense, although the sun had left the pavement, and the little fellow was evidently longing for pure, cool air. He had a mild blue eye, and one of those faces that always wins you to stop and look at it; but all about him indicated the extremest poverty. He was a sufferer. His neck and the sides of his head were bound in a large poultice, and the hot air was sadly annoying. We stopped and looked in his face. He raised his eyes to us. A world of sorrow looked out of those blue windows. His expression was one of perfect hopelessness—absolute despair. It was a painful sight to see a young heart so crushed; the lightsome heart of childhood, out of which life was wholly gone. As we paused, he looked up feebly, but did not smile; there was no change of expression, nor look of interest. A merry group was sporting in the street. His gaze wandered vacantly toward them, and then away again. The slow movement of his eyes from object to object, was inexpressibly mournful. His mother came to the door. He half turned to her, and lifted a tiny hand, as if to ask her to take him in her arms, but dropped it again slowly and sorrowfully into his lap, and fixed that unchanging gaze of sadness on her face. At length he buried his little fist in his cheek, and with his elbow on his knee, turned his eyes toward the clouds that were drifting across the narrow strip of blue above him, and then we fancied we saw a smile flitting around his lip; but as we watched, it was gone, and only that look of agony remained. An hour afterward we had forgotten him, for these changing scenes efface each others' impressions rapidly.

But a few days afterward, we were passing down B—— street again, and saw three carriages standing before the door at which the boy had been sitting. The poorest of the Irish poor find means to have carriages at their funerals.

Our little sufferer was doubtless dead. The broken heart had sprung to life again.

How miserable life has become when death is an actual relief! and yet thousands in our city long for such a relief; worn old men as well as sad-eyed boys. [Jour. Com.

MYSTERIOUS PROVIDENCES.

BY DR. W. A. ALCOTT.

In a town of this Commonwealth, containing some two thousand or more inhabitants, the number of deaths of children under five years of age, during the year 1847, was no less than thirty-three. This was regarded by every body as a most mysterious Providence. Even the minister at the desk exhorted his hearers and people to behold in it the immediate hand of God.

These mysterious Providences—this immediate hand of God—are not confined to occasions; they are every-day occurrences. In another of our Massachusetts villages, after the death, in rapid succession, of a great number of little children, and a general outcry, it was discovered that a collection of putrid matter had found its way to every pump, where the children had sickened and died. The mystery was now dispelled. Neither preacher nor people had a remaining doubt.

In general, however, it is not so. We have not been accustomed to trace the relation between the effect and its cause. And consequently, when a person dies, and the cause is not obvious, we refer it to a mysterious Providence; or, as some express it, to the immediate hand of God.

A young medical gentleman died a short time since, of erysipelas. His death was sudden, and to most persons, even his physicians, unexpected. There was a universal cry raised, not only by the mass of community, but by the physicians themselves, of mysterious Providence. The mass do not reason, and are therefore superstitious; the physicians, in many instances, cannot themselves reason far enough to find out the cause, or have not the necessary time—or at least think they have not—and too proud to confess their own ignorance, they join in the general cry, and arraign at the same bar the great and all-wise Creator.

Is this wisdom? Is it true humility? Is it a true Christianity? I for one have not so learned Christ. I believe in the relation of cause and effect; and that diseases, of every kind and grade, are the result of human transgression. [Boston Prisoner's Friend.

THE PEDANT SILENCED.—At a dinner party one of the company challenged any person to start a question to which he could not give a satisfactory answer. All were silent, till a worthy clergyman said, "This plate furnishes me with a question. Here is a fish that has always lived in salt water; pray tell me why it should come out a fresh fish, and not a salt one?" The boaster was silenced: nor was there one in the room who envied him his feelings.

SABBATIC QUERIES ANSWERED.

It is a rare thing, in these days, to find a newspaper with its columns open to the discussion of both sides of a disputed question, however important. Even the religious press, as it is called, is generally occupied in advocating the popular view, or the view entertained by the particular sect to which it belongs, without manifesting the least disposition to furnish readers with what is said on the other side, so as to enable them to judge for themselves. The Bible Sabbath has suffered greatly from this state of things. A rival institution—which is sedulously and pertinaciously, though in the face of reason and Scripture, called the Sabbath—is constantly urged upon the attention of community through the medium of the religious press; but when the advocates of God's institution desire to set forth its claims through the same medium, the door is closed, and every effort made to keep the people in ignorance upon the subject. We are glad to know that there is an occasional exception to this general remark; and such we regard the paper from which the following articles are taken. It is published at Utica, N. Y., and is the organ of that portion of the Baptist denomination who have seceded from the popular Baptist missionary organizations on account of their connection with slavery, and united in establishing what is called the Free Mission Society—a society which refuses to receive contributions from slaveholders. Very gladly do we witness such evidences of a disposition to hear, and allow others to hear, both sides of the Sabbath question. We shall be still more gratified to find, that future manifestations of this disposition are not checked, as they have been in some other cases which we might mention, by the admonitions and cautions of brethren who are afraid of "unsettling the public mind"—(as though it were ever settled)—upon this important subject.

THE SEVENTH DAY.

UNION, ME., AUG. 1, 1848.

BR. GROSVENOR:—You and I profess to be great sticklers for Bible principles, and for Bible truth, and such we ought to be.

When we are asked, why we embrace Christianity, we do not hesitate to give the reason. Are we required to give a reason for the hope that is in us, we are ready to do it with meekness and fear. If it is required of us to give a reason for embracing those peculiar views which we hold pertaining to the order of God's house, we are always glad to do it, and so it is touching the matter of slavery.

But, supposing we are asked why we observe the Sabbath day, what would be our answer? Would it not be that God has directly commanded us so to do? But, when that command was given, was it not the seventh day that men were commanded to observe? And if so, why are we not doing it? For one, I am prepared to say, that I have been taught by man to observe the first, instead of the seventh. But whence is this? Who has authorized man thus to teach? I was taught by man to believe in infant-sprinkling, in lieu of circumcision, but that I can not now do, neither can you.

Perhaps you have more light on this subject; if so, allow me to beg the favor of it. I want light. Yes, my dear brother, I feel that you go for light and for truth. Will you tell me who has authorized us to neglect the keeping of that day which was embraced in the fourth commandment, when that command was given?

What passage of the Scripture can you cite to me, where I may find an order or permission, authorizing the change which has been made? Perhaps you have (as I heretofore have) thought that it was immaterial what day, if a seventh part of our time was kept. But this is language which we, as Baptists, do not admit, touching divine institutions. The first question with me is, who authorized the change? was it God or man? and when was it done? We are living in a day of great recklessness, touching the observance of the Sabbath. I wish to preach upon it, and what shall I say? I wish to bring down upon the people the solemn and awful weight of a divine command for observing the Sabbath, and where shall I get it, if I enjoin upon them to keep the first day of the week? Can you tell me whether this is or is not the work of councils, after the days of Christ and the apostles? If so, I should not so much wonder that the Lord of the Sabbath day is permitting the day which man has appointed to lose its influence and control over the community.

I am aware of the care and labor which your situation involves, and I would not trouble you, did I not attach some importance to this matter, and also know that you are for the truth, the whole truth, and consequently for investigation. Will you favor me with a private letter on the subject, or else, still better, a piece on the subject in your Christian Contributor.

Most sincerely, yours,
H. HAWES.

REMARKS.—The question raised by Elder Hawes has occupied many of our thoughts for years past, and the thoughts of many others. At present we prefer to lay it before our readers without attempting a reply, in the hope that such reply as the word of God contains may be freely sought by every one for himself. We have before expressed our views on the general question of keeping the Sabbath in all ages; and shall be willing to say what we can on the specific point raised by the letter. EDITOR.

From the Christian Contributor of August 23.

BR. GROSVENOR:—I observed in the 24th number of the Christian Contributor a letter from Eld. Hawes raising the question, by what authority the Sabbath has been changed from the seventh day to the first, and calls for scriptural evidence that it has been done by divine authority; and as you preferred publishing his letter without attempting a reply, I have volunteered to answer his question. But before attempting this, I propose to make some observations on the design of the Sabbath, and the extent of the obligation to observe it.

It has been a practice from time immemorial to commemorate important events, either by erecting monuments or establishing monumental institutions, by which the memory of those events is handed down to succeeding generations. Witness the pile of stones erected on crossing the Jordan as an instance of the first; and the institution of the passover, of the latter. Or, in modern times, the Bunker Hill monument and the celebration of the 4th of July. Should future generations inquire their meaning, they will be told that one was reared to commemorate the heroism of our fathers at the battle of Bunker Hill, and the other was instituted as a memorial that on the 4th of July, 1776, the American Congress declared the then colonies of Great Britain free and independent States. So God, when he had created the world in six days, and rested on the seventh, instituted the Sabbath as a memorial of that event; so that the Sabbath is a standing evidence against atheism. Whatever other reasons might have existed for instituting the Sabbath, this one stands forth in the Word of God as the most prominent. See Gen. ii. 2, 3, and Exodus xx. 8—11. So that, when our children shall ask us what we mean by ceasing from labor every seventh day, they should be told that God instituted the Sabbath to commemorate the event of his creating the world in six days, and resting from his work on the seventh.

We argue that to keep the Sabbath on any other than the seventh day, would be as absurd as to erect a monument on the shores of Africa or at New Orleans, to commemorate the battle of Bunker Hill, or to celebrate the Declaration of Independence on the 8th of January.

It is equally unscriptural to urge that one seventh part of time was consecrated to rest, and that any other than the seventh might answer as well. God never sanctified one seventh part of time but as a consequence of sanctifying the seventh day. Remove sanctification from the seventh day, and the one seventh part of time falls as an inevitable consequence. It is vain to urge the fourth command as laying men under obligation to observe the first day of the week as holy time. No matter what events, however important or stupendous, may be alledged to have transpired on that day, the fourth command does not recognize them. We are frank to admit that other reasons may exist which may be urged as additional motives for observing the seventh day, but none could be admitted as evidence of a change of Sabbath, without being accompanied with an express declaration of the divine will.

In pursuing this investigation, it is important to ascertain not only the design of the institution, but likewise the extent of the command, and on whom its obligations rest. It has been urged that the Sabbath was merely a Jewish Institution, that it belonged to the ceremonial code, and of course is not binding on any other people, but expired with other ceremonial institutions. But if the view above taken is correct (and that view we think is sustained by the scriptures,) then the obligation to observe the seventh day extends to all men and to all time. For the same reasons that existed for the institution of the Sabbath at the end of creation, still exist now in all their force, and will do so as long as time endures. If God has instituted a different day, it must be for different reasons, and requires a different command. In that case he will not have changed the old Sabbath, but added a new one to that already in existence.

But to return to the question, Has the Sabbath been changed by divine authority? That the substitution of the first day to the exclusion of the seventh has to a certain extent prevailed, we readily admit; but the admission of the fact, does by no means prove the righteousness of the act. Will any Baptist admit that because Pedobaptists have substituted infant sprinkling for believer's immersion, that therefore infant sprinkling is gospel baptism? We presume that such Baptists can not be found.

If it is claimed that God has substituted the first day in place of the seventh, we have a right to demand better proof than that many learned and pious people have adopted the sentiment. Let the express warrant be given. Let us be shown the changing act. A thus saith the Lord will end the dispute, and silence all objection. But such a command has never been shown, or even attempted. Here we might close the argument, and give it as our opinion that a first-day Sabbath has no more claim to be considered a divine institution than infant sprinkling.

We now propose to examine the arguments offered to prove that the change, though not directly commanded, yet is to be considered of divine origin. We would, however, premise that the Sabbath is a positive as well as a moral institution, and that all positive institutions owe all their obligation to the law that enacts them,—that that law is the exact measure of obedience. No more—no less. And that, when Baptists attempt to establish any positive institution by a train of inferential arguments, they abandon the high ground of express warrant which has ever been our glory and our boast. We have successfully maintained ourselves against our Pedobaptist brethren, by adhering to the ground of express warrant; but the moment we abandon this ground in the Sabbath discussion, we become obnoxious to the charge of inconsistency, and become as weak as Samson shorn of his hair. I conceive we must admit infant sprinkling, or repudiate a first-day Sabbath.

In order to establish the change of Sabbath, it is contended that as redemption is a greater work than that of creation, and that as Christ finished that work when he arose from the dead, therefore, we should commemmorate that event by sabbatizing on the first day of the week. To this declaration we have several answers. In the first place, we remark, that this is assumption rather than proof. Do the Scriptures inform us that the work of redemption is greater than that of creation? Or have we power to decide in the absence of revelation which is greatest? Can we decide on the comparative magnitude of two immeasurable distances or things? It is no proof, because one event may be more interesting to us than another, that of course it must be greater. None but God could effect either, and when he is pleased to reveal which is greatest, we will humbly bow in submission. Till then we are content to remain in ignorance of their relative magnitude. But was the work of redemption completed at the resurrection of Christ? We think not, but conceive that it was as essential that he should enter the holy of holies as our High Priest, as that he should die and rise again. But secondly, should we admit that the work of redemption is greater than the work of creation, and that he completed that work when he rose from the dead, yet that would not constitute the day of his resurrection a Sabbath, without a divine command. Has God commanded it? If so, let the command be shown, and we are satisfied. But if this can not be done, we are arrogating to ourselves the prerogatives of the Most High, when we attempt to establish it. Who hath required these things at our hands.

But it is urged, that though we have no positive command for the change of the Sabbath, yet if the apostles who were inspired men kept the first day, it is sufficient evidence of the divine will, and that apostolic example is equal to a precept—so say our Pedobaptist brethren. But do we abide by this declaration? Are we ready to be circumcised because Paul circumcised Timothy? Do we hold ourselves bound to sell our farms and cast the price into one common fund, because the disciples did so on a certain occasion. Or do we hold to the breaking of bread between midnight and break of day, because Paul did so at Troas. We urge apostolic example to little effect, until we are ready to comply with the above examples. But did the apostles Sabbatize on the first day of the week? Until this question is answered in the affirmative, there can no support be drawn for a change of Sabbath from apostolic example. What do the Scriptures teach on this subject? We learn from the Acts of the Apostles, that it was their uniform practice to observe the Sabbath according to the command. Let the reader peruse the book of the Acts of the Apostles with attention and candor, and we have no hesitation in believing that he will be satisfied of the fact. But we are told that this was done in conformity to the Jews, but by what authority I know not. The Scriptures state no such thing. But we are told that the disciples met the very evening after the resurrection to commemorate the new Sabbath, and that Christ met with them. That most of the apostles were together the evening after the resurrection is readily admitted, but that they met to commemorate the resurrection is doubted, or that they had religious worship on that occasion remains to be proved.

We think it highly probable, from what is recorded in Acts i. & xiii., that the apostles all dwelt together in an upper room at Jerusalem, so that instead of their meeting to celebrate the new Sabbath, they only shut the door in fear of the Jews. Beside this, Christ, when he appeared to them, reproached them for their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they did not believe the report of those who said they had seen him after he was risen from the dead, and not a word was said about a change of Sabbath. But we are told they met again on the next first day for the same purpose. To say nothing of the fact that this meeting was after eight days, the Scriptures furnish us with no proof that they met to keep the new Sabbath, or that they had any worship at all on that occasion. It is probable, as on the former occasion, that they were all at home and Thomas with them. In these meetings, (if meetings they were,) no evidence is furnished for a change of Sabbath, or that the disciples ever met on the first day for worship.

Nor does the fact of the outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost afford any evidence of a change of Sabbath. Sabbatizing is not mentioned, nor is the first day of the week even once named in this transaction. It is a disputed point on what day of the week Pentecost happened that year. Some have declared that it was on the first day, others of equal learning and piety have claimed that it was on the seventh. To me it is a matter of indifference what day it was. It was not as the seventh nor the first day, but as Pentecost, that it was observed. It does appear to me that if the Holy Spirit had intended this meeting as an evidence of change of Sabbath, he would have been more explicit on the subject.—The meeting at Troas has likewise been claimed as evidence of a change of Sabbath, but with no better success than the former. They did have public worship on that occasion, but it was an evening meeting, and holden in view of the apostle's taking his final leave of the brethren, and according to the scriptural method of reckoning time, it must have been on the evening following the seventh day.

Nor does the instruction given by the apostle to certain churches, that they should lay by them in store on the first day of the week a contribution for the poor saints at Jerusalem, furnish any proof of their sabbatizing on that day. A meeting of the church is not even hinted at, but every one was to lay by him (i. e. by himself) in store as God had prospered him. Nor was the duty assigned compatible with sabbatizing. They were to compute their loss and gain, and contribute accordingly. Nor, lastly, does the term Lord's day in Revelation furnish any support to a first day Sabbath. The Scriptures nowhere apply that appellation to the first day of the week. It is doubtful whether the revelator had allusion to any particular day of the week, and least of all is it probable that the first day was intended. The seventh day has a far stronger claim to that epithet; as the Lord in Isaiah calls the Sabbath his holy day, and Christ says that the Son of Man is even Lord of the Sabbath. The Sabbath day then is the Lord's day. To urge, because some Christians now call the first day of the week Lord's day, that it must have been so understood by the revelator, is as absurd as to urge that because Pedobaptists now call infant sprinkling gospel baptism, it must have been so understood by the apostles and primitive Christians.

There is one other fact which I wish to notice. That is, that the Jews, who never failed to urge against the Savior any seeming departure from their views of Sabbath sanctification, never urged this objection against the apostles after the resurrection of Christ. If they had disregarded the seventh day and observed the first, they would not have failed to have urged this as evidence of the falsity of the Christian religion. Even to this day the practice of some Christians in secularizing the seventh day, and in keeping a day unknown to their law, is a great stumbling-block in their way, and furnishes them with an argument for repudiating the Christian religion, and for treating its Divine Author as an imposter.

From the above reasons, we are irresistibly led to the conclusion that a change of Sabbath is not of God, that it was unknown to the apostles and primitive Christians, and that we must seek its origin among the innovations introduced into the Christian church since the days of the apostles. All which we are ready to prove when called on so to do.

THE HOME MISSION.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I have just finished reading your notice of the proceedings of the twin Associations, whose Anniversary Meetings were held at New Market last week; and I cannot refrain from repeating the great disappointment I experienced, in not getting to that place, after having proceeded two-thirds of the way thither. Unexpected as was my recall, and imperative as was the necessity to return, I, perhaps, should not have yielded, had there been any information received for definite action by the Central Committee, which it was expected would meet at the same time and place; but in the absence of information to act advisedly, I felt that it would be indulging a personal gratification to be there and mingle in your exercises, while stern duty interdicted it. On the contrary, had there been information, at hand, for the Central Committee to act upon, I should have regarded that duty paramount to any private considerations, and would have continued my journey at all hazards.

I have longed for years to be with you on one of those heart-stirring, soul-enlivening occasions, but have ever had to yield to other demands on my time, and endure the saddening disappointment of "hope deferred, which maketh the heart sick." Still my spirit has followed you in all your convocations, and my prayers ascended to the Lord of Hosts, that He would bless and prosper his faithful People. I rejoiced, twelve months since, to learn of your very propitious meeting at DeRuyter. I rejoiced to hear that you had lighted up the watch-fires on the mountain tops in the interior. I, now, wished to hear, personally, the report from the outposts; how the war is carried on against Error—how the brotherhood strike hands in the good cause. I wished to catch a spark of the enthusiasm myself, to warm and cheer me in my efforts to maintain my integrity, in hallowing the true Sabbath, in my lone and isolated position; which I have endeavored to do, and which, through grace, I have been enabled, thus far, to persevere in honoring, amid all the cares of life and the distracting influences which surround me.

In looking over your proceedings, I regret to find so little interest manifested, by the denomination, in behalf of the Home Mission. It is a field of the utmost importance. It is the field for our effort. You must, (permit me to say,) do more at home, if you expected to succeed abroad. I have, always, admired the early missionary system of my German Brethren, in their palmy days. The German Seventh-day Baptists of the last century—the Church of Ephrata—was a pattern of a missionary church—a pattern for missionary enterprise. They thought and carried out the principle, too, that every church ought to keep at least two missionaries in the field. They had twelve—elders and laymen—appointed to that service; who were sent out two and two. As two returned to the Lager, two more went out—so that there were never less than two, and oft-times many more, in the field at the same time. Their plan was to go out and visit every family, and especially in the sparse settlements on the frontier of the State—to read the Scriptures to them, and to pray with them. That was the true missionary spirit; but for years past it has been discontinued. Ephrata has fallen—is spiritually dead. Snowhill is a more recent establishment, and has had to struggle for existence. They are entirely out of the way of witnessing modern efforts and modern association for the propagation of the truth. They live in a very secluded settlement, know but little of the affairs of the world, and care less of mingling with it—of coming in contact with its errors and its follies—to become contamenated with it. They seek retirement and obscurity, unambitious of honors or wealth, and desiring nothing but to be left unmolested to pursue the even tenor of their way, in the enjoyment of the spark of truth vouchsafed to their keeping. While I do not approve of this hiding their light under a bushel, I am happy to be able to bear the above testimony, that it has not been always thus with them. Their early missionary system was the system I approve of most heartily. To commence at Jerusalem, yet not to stop at Jerusalem: but as a pebble cast into the centre of a lake, sends out successive ripples, whose undulations follow each other until they kiss the surrounding shores, so we must drop the pebble in our midst, and watch and see that each successive circle enlarges, until they reach the utmost limits of the habitable globe. I have no objection whatever to drop the pebbles of faith on both sides of the globe at the same time, and let the waves of Christian love and missionary devotion, meet and embrace each other mid-way; and thus hasten the day of our Lord and Master, when every nation, tongue, and kindred, shall praise his name; but I do protest against relaxing effort in our midst. Therefore, while I wish you God speed, from the very bottom of my heart, with your foreign enterprise, and think you will sin, sin deeply, if you do not sustain and strengthen the hands of those whom you have sent to the heathen, yet I am afraid that you lack duty, at home, in suffering the Domestic Mission to lag. If we are, as Sabbath-keepers, to exercise any influence on the world, and advance the truth we have espoused, we must first make headway at home. Here is the spot to exert our influence to the best advantage, having the written Word in a known tongue, and every facility to comfront Error. If we withhold effort here, vain will be our efforts abroad. True policy, as well as imperative duty, enjoin it. You must renew and redouble your efforts for the Home Mission, if you wish to sustain and extend the foreign enterprise.

If I had time, I would endeavor to urge upon your readers, the necessity, as well as the duty, of renewed effort to disseminate the unadulterated truth among the people of this favored land. I must, however, conclude, with a paraphrase of "Boston Bard's" beautiful and pertinent apostrophe:—

> "O, thou, who send'st thy wealth abroad,
> Unto the distant, heathen shore,—
> T'is unaccepted of thy God,
> If thou withhold, at they own door,
> Eternal truth—eternal light—
> Shrouded, by man, in darkness of night."

WESTERN MISSION.

The establishment of missions in the valley of the Mississippi by the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, has long been a favorite object with many of the brethren. To them it will be gratifying intelligence, that we are now ready to enter upon the work. The Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, at a recent session in New Market, N. J., resolved to undertake such a mission immediately, and appointed Bro. Samuel Davison its missionary. I am directed by the Board to lay the matter before the denomination, through the Recorder, and to solicit an immediate contribution of funds for the object. To encourage our brethren in this work, I would say, that the mission will be prosecuted—not for a few months, and then abandoned if not successful, but—for a term of years. Our missionary will locate himself permanently in the West, and, under the patronage of the Board, will aim at the organization of churchas, and at establishing them upon a lasting foundation. His field of labor—not yet definitely fixed—will be somewhere in the north part of Illinois, or in the adjacent States of Iowa and Wisconsin. It is hoped that our churches will proceed at once to raise funds for this mission, and, when raised, that they will forward them to our Treasurer, A. D. Titsworth, Metouchin, N. J. Will the pastors and other leading brethren, see to this matter in their respective churches? Having no Agent, we depend upon their zeal and faithfulness.

On behalf of the Board.
THOS. B. BROWN, Cor. Sec.

P. S. In forwarding money to the Treasurer, be careful and specify the particular object for which it is contributed, whether for the Western or the Foreign Mission; and if for both, what proportion for the Western, and what for the Foreign.

MEETING OF THE AMERICAN BOARD.—The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions held a meeting at Boston last week, when about 75 members, out of the 175 who compose the Board were present. From the Treasurer's Report, presented on the occasion, it seems that the receipts for the past year were $254,056 40, being $42,653 70 more than was received the preceeding year, and leaving a debt on the Board of about sixty thousand dollars. During the year, 32 Missionaries and assistants have been sent forth to the ten different stations. Out of 370 on the ground, only two have died, and two been killed by the savages during the year. The principal topics discussed at the meeting were in relation to slavery in the Indian Churches, and polygamy in the native churches gathered among the heathen. It seems that the members of the Board in attendance at the Missionary Rooms have expressed themselves to the missionaries among the Indians against slavery, and also against poligamy. The Board declined to express itself decidedly upon these subjects, preferring to leave the subject with the Secretaries of the Board.

A WORD OF ADVICE.—Several months ago Mr. Oliver Johnson, for several years an assistant editor of the N. Y. Tribune, started a paper on his own account at Blackstone, Mass. Being a practical printer and an accomplished journalist, he made a paper which was entitled to patronage. But notwithstanding its merits, and the liberal promises of its friends, the paper has been discontinued for want of adequate support. In his valedictory, Mr. Johnson gives the following sensible advice:—

"To all printers I have a word of advice, and it shall be given with an unction. If you are asked to start a newspaper, don't rely on verbal promises to obtain subscribers. Calculate all the expenses of the enterprise, omitting no item that you can think of, and then multiply the aggregate by 2. Then estimate the probable income setting down each item at the lowest point that may be named by the most cautious of all your friends. Divide the aggregate by 2, and if the latter product equals the first, go ahead; otherwise have no more to do with the project than you would with the small-pox or the cholera. If my experience will enable me to keep others from burning their fingers, I shall not be left wholly without consolation."

---

DISCONTINUED.—For several weeks we have missed from our table the Watertown Spectator, published by Joel Greene. We now learn, through another paper published in the same village, that the Spectator has been discontinued for want of support. It was devoted to the temperance cause, and advocated quite earnestly the organization of Sons of Temperance.

NEWS FROM OUR MISSIONARIES.—Letters were received last week from our Missionaries at Shanghai, dated as late as May 10. They were all well at that time, and appear to have been diligently prosecuting their work.

General Intelligence.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The steamer Europa has arrived since our last, bringing seven days later news from Europe, the substance of which we give below.

From England, we learn that the prospect of the crops, both grain and potatoes, is somewaht better than it was a week earlier. As a consequence the advance in prices has been checked. The trial of the chartists has been continued; several have have been found guilty, and condemned to suffer two years' imprisonment, and pay small fines.

The news from Ireland is any thing but cheering. The potato crop is said to be a total failure, while the wheat crop is one-fourth below the average produce. A famine, worse than heretofore experienced, is probably inevitable. The Special Commission, for the trial of O'Brien and his coadjutors, was to open about the 20th of September.

In Paris, an armed force has been again collected, and there are serious fears of another revolution. Warrants having been issued, by the Commission of Inquiry in relation to the Revolts, for the apprehension of Louis Blanc and Caussidiere, they have fled from Paris. The present Government of France is suppressing the opposition journals, on the plea that it is necessary until the new order of things becomes more firmly established.

In Northern Italy, troubles continue. Several partial engagements have taken place with the Italian guerrillas, but nothing decisive or of special importance has occurred.

A serious conflict has taken place in Vienna, between the National Guard and the laborers employed on the public works. An attempt was made to reduce the wages of the workmen, whereupon they got up a mob, which was not suppressed until probably one hundred of the workmen, and a considerable number of the military, were killed and wounded.

In the Provinces of Wallachia, sanguinary collisions are constantly taking place between the Greeks and the Turkish soldiers.

A six-months armistice between Denmark and Prussia, has been agreed upon, through the representatives of the French and English Governments.

Letters from Persia announce the entire defeat of the royal troops by the insurgents of Korassan. The royal army was cut to pieces, and the capital placed in great alarm.

DREADFUL HURRICANE ON THE EAST COAST OF SCOTLAND.—ABERDEEN, Aug. 19—Last night about 1,000 boats, each manned by five fishermen, left the various ports of the East coast of Scotland, between Stonehaven and Fraserburg, for the herring fishery. About twelve o'clock it blew a gale, the rain falling in torrents, and the night was so dark that none of the land lights could be seen. At Peterhead, which is the easternmost point of the coast, and altogether exposed to an easterly gale, 70 out of the 400 boats that were fishing there are missing, and there is too much reason to fear that most if not all of them are wrecked or sunk. The shore between the Buchanness light-house and the entrance to the South harbor, for a mile and a half, was strewed with wrecks and the dead bodies of fishermen.

Twenty-three corpses were carried into Peterhead before nine o'clock, and at the time the latest accounts, left others were constantly thrown ashore among the wrecks on the sand or the rocks. Forty boats were wrecked within the circuit of half a mile, and so sudden and awful was the catastrophe, that no means of succoring or saving the distressed and perishing fishermen could be devised. How many boats may have foundered at sea or gone to pieces among the precipitous cliffs of Buchanness, no one at present can tell. One thing appears certain, that the lowest estimate of the loss of life and property by this gale exceeds that produced by any other hurricane hitherto recorded in the annals of the East Coast of Scotland. It is calculated that along the coast not fewer than a hundred lives are lost, and when it is considered that for the most part the deceased fishermen have left wives and families, it will be felt that the widowhood and orphanage of our seaport towns have received in one short night an unparalleled augmentation.

OUTRAGES IN TEXAS.—A correspondent of the N. Y., Tribune, writing from the mouth of the Rio Grande, under date of August 12, says:—Speaking of Texas and Texans reminds me of tidings that reached here, a few days ago, beyond doubt substantially true. Some seventy-five or eighty of the Texan Rangers, officers as well as men, discharged from our services a few weeks since, at Camargo, have banded together for the purpose of robbing the defenceless Mexicans this side the mountains. Last week they made a descent upon the town of Sabinus, situated near the foot of the Cerralvo Mountains, between them and the Rio Grande; and after various murders and other outrages, they demanded a contribution of a large sum of money, threatening in the alternative, the total destruction of the town and its inhabitants. The imbecile inhabitants actually raised and paid over the sum of $14,000, with which the villains decamped. The next day they obtained of the town Ville Aldamas, by a like levy, $11,000. This town is in the vicinity of Sabinus.

These desperadoes are well organized, well mounted, and well armed with the formidable "five-shooter," which they know so well how to wield. They can defy quadruple their number of rancheros on a fair field, and in any event can make good their retreat to the Texan borders in the face of twenty times their number, by reason of the superiority of their horses over the Mexican mustang. The facts here stated are derived from an intelligent American gentleman just arrived from Monterey. All the upper towns are represented as in a state of alarm and preparation for defence.

JUDGE CONE AND HON. A. H. STEPHENS.—A gentleman writing from Atalanta (Ga.) Sept. 3, gives the following account of the attempted murder of Hon. A. H. Stephens by Judge Cone.

Francis H. Cone, in a Cass speech, said that Stephens had betrayed the South, and was a traitor to his State, &c. &c. &c. Stephens heard of it, and said he would make him retract. S. saw him, and asked him if he had made such a remark. C. denied it. So the matter dropped. The friends of C. told him, if he did not take the matter up they would discard him. So he goes to Atalanta, where S. was to be that day—meets him on the steps of the hotel—calls out, Retract, Sir! and cursed violently. A blow was struck. Cone sprang on S., threw him on the floor, and stabbed him five times, until the knife broke off in the body of S. It was done in a second, before any one could interfere. Stephens is remarkably slight and feeble, weighing about eighty-six pounds, I think. Cone is a very large, stout, strong man, weighing over two hundred pounds. The people were so shocked that they let C. escape while they assisted Stephens. Could he have been caught, ten minutes after, he would have been torn in pieces. The citizens will probably offer a large reward for him. One man has subscribed $400. Cone is a fine looking man, large, six feet high, dark eyes, intellectual face; voice coarse; hair slightly gray; one of his front teeth slightly worn or broken off; he is about forty or fifty years old. Stephens was the great man of the last session of Congress. He was the man to oppose corruption in high places. On this account he was feared. YORK.

INTERESTING SLAVE CASES.—The Holly Springs (Miss.) Gazette, of the 4th inst., gives the following important cases, decided in the Circuit Court. The first was to this effect:

Two men had employed a slave without the consent of the master, to assist them in unloading a wagon of cotton, promising to pay the slave in liquor. The liquor was furnished, and the boy while engaged in unloading the wagon was killed by a third person. Suit was brought by the owner of the slave for his value, against all the parties, the employees and the slayer. The jury gave the plaintiff a verdict for the value of the slave against all the defendants.

The other case was a State prosecution against a slave for stealing a slave:

The Court, Hon. Hugh R. Miller presiding, charged the jury that a slave could steal a slave, and that the owner of the thief was responsible to the owner of the stolen slave for his value. The case was one of much excitement, inasmuch as negro testimony was admitted on behalf of the State to sustain the prosecution. The jury found a verdict for the prisoner, upon the ground, as stated by them in rendering their vedict, that the proof for the prosecution was not satisfactory.

HURRICANE IN THE WEST INDIES.—A dispatch to the N. Y., Tribune, dated Boston, Sept. 13, says that farther accounts of the dreadful hurricane in the West Indies have been received. At St. Kitts it lasted 5 hours, with three shocks of an earthquake, during which the barometer fell to 28° 6'. Through the whole Island most of the buildings are destroyed, and the sugar-cane completely prostrated. The loss of life is very great. The schooner Mary foundered with all on board. A vessel at St. Martin's was lost, and ten of her crew perished. A number of persons have also been killed by the falling of buildings. The Legislature has been called together.

From Antigua the accounts are interesting. Eagle Harbor and Falmouth are nearly overthrown. Pretty much all the plantations on the Island are injured. Eleven persons have been killed by the falling of buildings, and five churches thrown down. The injury is greater than by the hurricane of 1837 or the earthquake of 1843. It is feared that worse accounts are yet to come.

THE POTATOE DISEASE.—The following, derived from practical experience, are well deserving of attention: 1. Let all early potatoes that are ripe be immediately taken up. 2. Examine the stalks of all others every day. 3. Whenever you find any stalk diseased put your feet, one on each side of it and pull it up, leaving the potatoes in the ground—do not cut the stalk off but pull it up by the roots. 4. Then tread down and harden the ground over the pototoes, and trench it up. 5. Burn the diseased stalks, do not on any account leave them on the ground. 6. All the late potatoes should remain in the ground and be dug up only as wanted, for when the disease has once made its appearance exposure to the air is found to increase it.

WHOLESALE POISONING.—We understand, says the Winchester (Va.) Republican, that the family of Col. Edward Colston, of Berkley, to the number of 26, were poisoned on Monday last. A large number of the family are still confined to their beds, though we believe no deaths, as yet, have occurred. Unfortunately, neither Col. C. nor any of his family are certain as to how they imbibed the poison. It is believed, however, to be communicated to the system by their partaking of some food which had been standing in a glazed stone jar or crock. The glazing substance of crockery ware, as is generally known, contains poisonous qualities.

A LIBERIA JUDGE IN DIFFICULTY.—A correspondent of the Philadelphia North American, writing from Newcastle, Delaware, Sept. 6, says:—

"Chief Justice Benedict, (a mulatto,) was arrested at the suit of a person named Tyson, of New York, and confined in our prison on Monday evening, for a debt of $450. A number of gentlemen of this place and Wilmington relieved him last evening by going his bail, and sent him on his way rejoicing. The vessel in which he goes to Liberia sails to-day."

SUMMARY.

The New York State Temperance Society will hold its annual meeting at Syracuse on the first Wednesday in October next. Eminent speakers from various quarters, will be in attendance; and the exercises promise to be of the most interesting character. It is stated that arrangements will be made with the managers of the various railroad, steamboat, and canal lines, between New York and Buffalo, by which those wishing to attend the meeting, can obtain tickets at half price.

Rev. Mr. Harris, former minister at Windham, N. H., but of late retired from the profession on account of age, committed suicide at his home in Windham, on Tuesday morning, the 5th inst., by throwing himself into a well. He had been unwell and very much depressed for some time previous. The disposition to insanity and suicide is said to be hereditary in the family.

The St. Louis Republican says that a splendid scheme of swindling, in the counterfeiting of soldiers' land claims, is on foot. If our suspicions are correct, the plan is to get blank claims, with the accompanying letter of John L. Edwards, printed in the same kind of type and upon the same paper as those printed at Washington, and then to fill them up in strict accordance with the original and genuine certificates.

In Waldoborough, Mass., two sons of Israel Prock were helping themselves to apples in the orchard of Mr. Hock, when a son of Mr. H., about 17 years of age, took his gun, which was loaded with buck shot, and fired. Both the boys were wounded, and one of them died in two days, while the other is recovering. The young man who fired the gun is in great distress on account of the effect of his inconsiderate course. He did not suppose the boys were near enough to be injured.

The Irish Government, under the agency of the Poor Law Board, have been making very urgent inquiries as to the actual condition at present, and future prospects of Ireland in respect to food; and the result, as committed to the executive, may be comprised in a very short sentence, "that there is barely food in the country to support the population till the first week in January."

Mr. A. O. Houghton, of Rahway, N. J., from experiments he has made for two or three years past, is satisfied that he has discovered a remedy for the potato rot. It is simply, when the disease makes its appearance, to pull up the tops, allowing the potatoes to remain in the ground until cold weather.

The St. John's New Brunswicker, of the 12th inst., says that the bark Cadmer, which arrived there, brought in the captain and 16 of the crew of the ship Glasgow, of Bath, Me., 594 tons, which ship was abandoned at sea in a sinking state on the 19th of August, in lat. 64 N. lon. 31 50 W. The Glasgow was bound from Liverpool to Boston with a full cargo of iron and salt, and went down shortly after the captain and crew were taken off.

The current of the Niagara river for the first five hundred feet below the Suspension Bridge, runs at the rate of nineteen miles per hour; for the next eight hundred feet it runs at the rate of twenty-five miles per hour—giving an average of about twenty-three miles per hour for the first quarter of a mile below the bridge.

The police of New York, have sent over to Brooklyn about $6,000 worth of property, stolen at the recent fire, and taken from thieves at the different ferry stations. One lady recovered her trunk, containing valuable papers and about $200.

The St. Louis Republican of the 26th ult., publishes information communicated by a gentleman just arrived in that city, stating that on his way from New Mexico he met over one thousand wagons, in different trains, bound to Santa Fe, El Passo, and Chihuahua. Nearly 400 of them were government wagons, with supplies for the troops in that quarter, and the remainded belonged to traders carrying merchandize.

The Tuscaloosa Observer states that a Mr. Bell, who suffered for eight years with cancer in the nose, was entirely cured by using a poultice of the common cranberry. It is so simple and innocent that every one afflicted with this disease should try it.

The amounts for which the bonds and mortgages belonging to the Atlas Bank were sold—$35,000—has been paid into the hands of the Controller, and he will soon declare a dividend, probably of 74 or 75 cents on the dollar, on the notes secured by real estate and State stock. The notes secured entirely by State stock, are paid at 97 cents on the dollar.

A very distressing accident happened Sept. 7, at Alexdndria, Va. A lady named Patterson undertook to chastise her little son, but unfortunately struck him the first blow on the temple, when he instantly fell dead. The mother has become entirely deranged.

A letter dated Fuhchau, China, June 5, mentions the death of Mrs. White, wife of Rev. Moses C. White. Mrs. White was one of the first missionaries sent out by the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States. Her death occurred on the 25th of May.

Alexander Slidell Mackenzie is no more. He died at Sing Sing, Sept. 14, from an affection of the heart. He was attacked while riding upon his horse in that village. He succeeded in getting his feet out of the stirrups, and immediately fell to the ground upon his head; was taken up and carried into a house by two persons who witnessed the fall, and breathed but twice afterward.

It appears, from a return just made to parliament, that the declared value of British machinery and millwork, exported from the United Kingdoms in the year ending on the 6th of January last, was £1,263,015.

A new spring of Iodine has been discovered between Toeltz and Beilbroun (Bavaria;) it is supposed to communicate with that of Adelaide.

Col. Fremont left Washington recently on a third expedition to the far West. His present enterprise is to be a private one.

The great telegraph case at Frankfort has been decided in favor of Morse's patent.

The Boston Journal says: A "team" arrived in Charlestown, last Saturday, from Industry, Me., 35 miles above Augusta, drawn by three small dogs. The team consisted of a small wagon, heavily laden with goods, beside containing the driver, a man of about 150 lbs. weight. He stated that they had draws 800 lbs. up hill without trouble, and that he had traveled 25 miles a day on an average.

Rev. Hampton Mathews of Tuscaloosa Co. Ala., died in the pulpit recently while preaching. Judge Wolcott Tyrrell, while making a political speech at the Schroon Lake House, Essex Co. in this State, suddenly fell back into his chair, fainted, and expired instantly. Both of these gentlemen were highly influential and promising in their several professions.

Rev. Dr. Nathaniel Kendrick, of the Madison University, died at his residence, Hamilton, Madison Co., on the 10th inst. He was most widely esteemed and beloved.

We notice in a south-western paper the decease of Francis Ingraham, who was in the first Revolutionary battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill, and died on the 24th August last, at Grandgulf, (Miss.) at the advanced age of 87 years. He was buried at Port Gibson.

Two colored preachers, free men, were arrested in Louisville the other day, and for want of $500 bail, committed to prison. Unless some friendly hand intervenes, they will be sold for the term of one year, to pay the expenses of the prosecution.

Scientific experiments have been made in connection with the telegraphic lines, to settle the long-disputed point as to the velocity of electricity. It is now ascertained that electricity travels 200,000 miles per second.

Rev. John Newland Maffit is drawing vast audiences in Arkansas, wherever he holds forth. He has been there for some time past, and is attracting universal attention. The press of the State warmly applaud him.

The farmers of the State of Delaware are suffering greatly for want of rain. The springs are nearly exhausted, and several flourishing mills have already stopped for want of water.

In a suit for breach of marriage promise in Chautauque Co., N. Y., Miss Phylosky Smith recovered $500 from Mr. C. Johnson.

Geo. W. Noxon of Syracuse, a young lawyer of much promise, died on Wednesday evening last, after attending a party at the residence of his father, B. David Noxon, Esq.

Shall live immortally the love that shone so brightly here."

LIFE'S SUNNY SPOTS.

BY WILLIAM LEGGETT.

Though life's a dark and thorny path,
  Its goal the silent tomb,
It yet some spots of sunshine hath,
  That smile amid the gloom.
The friend who weal and wo partakes,
  Unchanged, whate'er his lot,
Who kindly soothes the heart that aches,
  Is sure a sunny spot.

The wife, who half our burden bears,
  And utters not a moan;
Whose ready hand wipes off our tears,
  Unheeding all her own;
Who treasures every kindly word,
  Each harsher one forgot,
And carols blithely as a bird—
  She's too a sunny spot.

The child, who lifts, at morn and eve,
  In prayer, its tiny voice;
Who grieves whene'er its parents grieve,
  And joys when they rejoice;
In whose bright eye young Genius glows,
  Whose heart, without a blot,
Is fresh and pure as summer's rose—
  That child's a sunny spot.

There's yet, upon life's weary road,
  One spot of brighter glow,
Where sorrow hath forgot its load,
  And tears no longer flow;
Friendship may wither—love decline,
  Our child his honor blot;
But still, undimmed, that spot will shine—
  Religion lights that spot.

FRANCKE'S ORPHAN HOUSE.

The following highly interesting notice of Hermann Francke's labors, is from Dr. Carson's Loiterings in Europe:

Francke was a popular minister of the Pietists, or German evangelical party, of the seventeenth century. After wandering from place to place, the victim of change and persecution, he was at last rewarded with the appointment to a professorship in the University of Halle, and a pastoral charge in the suburb of Glauca. Entering upon his ministerial duties with great earnestness and success, his attention was early directed to the deplorable state of the surrounding poor. His labors were prodigious. It was customary in Halle for the needy to visit the houses of the citizens for special assistance, every Thursday. At this time it was a habit with Francke to assemble a room full of beggars, and, after kindly feeding them, to exhort and instruct the adults, and catechize the children. He found them deplorably ignorant, and their condition, in the words of his biographer, "went to his heart." To benefit them, he had successively established, with suitable inscriptions, three poor-boxes in different places. After these had been in operation a few months, a person dropped into one of them four Prussian dollars, a sum amounting to about three dollars of our money. It proved the seed that yielded a mighty harvest. Francke was delighted, and, even with so small a beginning, the idea of something permanent flashed upon his mind. "Without conferring," says he, "with flesh and blood, and acting under the impulse of faith, I made arrangements for the purchase of books to the amount of two dollars, and engaged a poor student to instruct the poor children for a couple of hours daily, promising to give him six groschen (about fourteen cents,) weekly, for so doing, in hope that God would, meanwhile grant more." Nor was the good pastor disappointed. He appropriated the antechamber to his own study as the place of his charity-school, and commenced operations about Easter 1695. Some of the townspeople sent their children, and paid a trifle weekly, to aid the gratuitous instruction of the charity-scholars. Encouraged by the success of his first undertaking, Francke was induced, shortly after, to commence what was afterward the Royal School, for more advanced pupils. His funds seemed to increase like the widow's oil; and the more he poured out the more came. About this time a person of rank offered him a donation of five hundred dollars, to assist poor students.

A few cents weekly were at first distributed to them; but in keeping with the habits of the social Germans, Francke afterward selected some twenty-four of the most needy, and appropriated the money to giving them a plain dinner. To make one thing help another, he chose his charity-teachers from these students, and thus originated his teachers' seminary. Finding it impossible to care properly for his poor children out of school, the thought struck him one day of providing a place for keeping some of them as in a family, and on mentioning it, a friend funded a sum for the purpose, the annual interest of which amounted to twenty-five dollars. Four fatherless and motherless children were brought to him just at the moment, and he ventured to receive them. It was the commencement of the most magnificent orphan asylum in the world. Yet the funds already provided were insufficient to maintain a single child for a year. In the words of its pious founder, "the orphan house was by no means commenced or founded upon any certain sum in hand, or on the assurances of persons of rank to take upon themselves the cost and charges, but solely and simply in reliance on the living God in heaven." Contributions, however, came gradually in; apartment after apartment was added, till at last the site of a neighboring inn was purchased, and, without money to buy even the first materials, and trusting alone in Providence, the good man laid the corner stone of a very large edifice. It is deeply interesting to follow the simple narrative of his German biographer. The neighbors sneered, and one man offered to be hanged on the building when it should be finished.

Yet year after year, as if by magic, the vast edifice steadily progressed. At the commencement and end of every week, the faithful minister assembled the workmen for prayer. Often he was reduced to the greatest straits for supplies, and once he could with difficulty purchase a couple of candles. His orphans sometimes ate their last loaf, and his workmen murmured for their wages. At these times, we are told, the good man invariably retired to his closet, to use his own words, "with a certainty of being heard by Him who hears the cry of the young ravens." In the moment of darkest despair help always came. The post brought bills of exchange from some distant stranger whom he had never seen, an unknown hand sent a well-filled purse, or a messenger came, perhaps, bearing the bequest of some departed friend.

Twice his enemies, envious of his fame, raised the hue and cry of persecution, and misrepresented him and his project to the government, and commissions of investigation were appointed, which resulted in his triumphant vindication. The storms that shook other men but rooted him more deeply. Opposition but spread the fame of his novel enterprise more and more, and contributions at length poured in from the rich and poor.

The king of Prussia gave two thousand dollars, and a hundred thousand bricks; a German prince dying, bequeathed the orphan-house five hundred ducats; and a physician in America sent a handsome donation in the time of the greatest need. An apothecary at Leipsic gave the medicines; the common hangman became a contributor, and a chimney-sweep bound himself to sweep the orphan house gratuitously as long as he lived.

Thirty-four years from the time the four dollars were dropped in Francke's poor-box, there was a touching scene. The venerable, dying minister was come to bid a last adieu to his orphans. His attendants, at his desire, conveyed him in an easy carriage into the yard of the orphan-house. What a change was there since he first saw the spot! Where the inn stood, in the miserable suburb, thirty-five years before, were then noble edifices, consecrated to benevolence, where gathered daily more than two thousand children. How sweet must have seemed the music of those young voices! He had built a monument as a boon to posterity, prouder than the pyramids. His dimmed eye rekindled with animation at beholding the blessed consummation of the darling purpose of a life. The expiring lamp flickered brightly once more. Again and again the life-blood quicked in the heart of the dying patriarch, till it thrilled like that of a hero falling in the moment of victory. Overcome with his emotions, feeble as he was, we are told he lingered, reclining in his carriage, a whole hour, with a faltering voice, pouring out thanks to Heaven, and fervent prayers for his orphan children. Then, as if his work were finished, he returned home to die.

Thousand, wept over his remains as over those of a near relative, and a whole city mourned his loss. Many generations have since passed, but his example remains as one of the illustrious good; the orphans at Halle still keep his birth-day, and thousands of helpless and lonely little ones have since lived to bless the name of Hermann Francke.

GREEK LEPERS.

When at daybreak we put out to sea, we were startled by hearing voices in a creek not far from that in which we had slept, and, on rounding a rocky point of the island, saw the speakers; and a melancholy sight it was. There sat, drenched and shivering, on the bare shore of this desolate islet, seven human beings in every stage of virulent leprosy. Three were far gone in the disease, a woman and two men, apparently old. The men had lost their sight, and one was speechless; and all had lost the use of their extremities, which, indeed, appeared to have been eaten away. Two others had not lost the use of their hands; but their toes were gone, and they could scarcely walk. A fine young man, and a well-grown, rather handsome girl, remained, and at a distance appeared unharmed; but on nearer approach, the bandages on one part of the female, and over one eye of the youth, told that the plague spot was upon them too. Their tale was a short one. They were a family of lepers, Greeks, from the island of Syme, who wandered from port to port in their boat, fishing and collecting alms. In the storm of the day before, they had been driven ashore in this little bay, and their boat lay much damaged on the beach. They had no means of lighting a fire, and no provisions. We gave them a light, and as much food as we could spare, which we placed on a rock, to be taken away by the younger, and the least afflicted of the party; adding, what they seemed to prize even more than food, a quantity of tobacco. Promising to inform their countrymen and others at Rhodes respecting their misfortunes, and to procure for them assistance, if possible, we sailed away from this sad interview with the victims of one of the most hidious and incurable afflictions of humanity; with many blessings from the poor lepers, and thankful for having been the means, through the accident of a storm in which we had nearly perished ourselves, of relieving, and possibly saving from a lingering death, these miserable people. Eventually we had the pleasure of hearing, in Rhodes, that they were enabled to get their boat once more afloat, and leave the desert rock on which they had been cast. [Travels in Lycia.

THE UNFORTUNATE CIPHER.

A merchant at Marseilles, having a business correspondent on the African coast, bethought him, that as some members of his family had shown a partiality for monkeys, he might gratify them by sending for one or two specimens of these animals from Africa. Accordingly, he wrote to his correspondent to procure two or three of the finest and most admired species, and transmit them to Marseilles. Chance so ordered it, that the merchant, in putting down the ou (in English or) between the figures 2 and 3, made the o very prominent, while the u remained scarcely visible, Some months afterwards. a ship-porter came in all haste to the old merchant, and announced to him that his menagerie had arrived; 'Menagerie!' cried the merchant. 'Yes, a menagerie, a whole cargo of monkeys had arrived to his consignment!' The merchant could scarcely credit the announcement, until the letter of his correspondent was put into his hands. In that epistle, the African negotiant, a man of the most uncompromising exactitude, excused himself very earnestly for not having been able, with all his exertions, to procure more than 160 monkeys, in place of 203 ordered, but promised, as soon as possible, to fulfil the entire demand. The feelings of the honest merchant may be guessed, when, on moving down to the quay, to satisfy himself on the subject by occular inspection, he beheld his 160 monkeys, all duly caged and littered, and grinning at him with the most laudable pertinacity. It was the moment when a man might reasonable doubt whether it would be best to laugh or cry. So much for the value of ciphers.

"Alfred Dividing his Loaf."—Early in the month of June, several working men were assembled in a public house in the Rue St. Martin, Paris, when a stranger joined them, and discoursed with great emotion on the beauties of Christian Communism. From precept proceeding to practice, he produced a twenty-five franc piece, and proposed to divide it with his new friends. "Take it," said he, "and give me ten francs." Charmed by his "fraternity" of feeling, they clubbed up the money, and he left them amidst mutual professions of regard. The twenty-five franc piece, like much of the fraternal talk of the times, was counterfeit!

"HAIL, COLUMBIA! HAPPY LAND!"

A Northern traveller at the South, in a communication to the editor of the New York Tribune, says:

"While in Petersburg, I had occasion to rise from a 'hasty plate' of green peas, on account of a rush to the windows of our dining hall. I looked, and saw a drove of more than fifty men and women, marching at a quick pace, two by two, going to the depot, there to take the Southern train of cars. It was a brief delegation of the 'peculiar institution,' traveling to New Orleans for an investment. At the depot, the 'drove' were closely packed into one car. A large number of the chattels showed a sort of brute indifference, and some, a worse than brute delight, at the thought of a railroad ride; while others looked very sorrowful, and wept bitterly. There was among them one very pretty white girl, with clear complexion, long, dark hair, and hazel eyes. She held a white cotton handkerchief to her face and wept despairingly. An intelligent looking colored man—her lover—her cousin—her brother—it may be a stranger!—went to her, and poured from his purse into his hand a few small pieces of silver, and a bit of yellow coin, probably not more than a quarter-eagle, (but I learned afterward that it was a majority of his property,) and just as the train was about starting, he called her attention, and quietly slipped the gold into her hand. She looked regret and thanks; she tried to return it, but the cars were off, and I felt more than ever the cruelty, severity, and cold-heartedness of slavery. I had seen it stated in our Northern papers that slaves were carried in droves, like sheep, to market; but I never appreciated or felt the fact until then."

AN HEIRLOOM.

In the bar-room of a tavern in Thornton, N. H., hangs, framed and glassed, the original of the following precious document. The loyal drummer referred to, was the great grandfather of the present landlerd; and the original proclamation, with Governor Shirley's autograph signature, has been carefully preserved in the family of John Boyen, and handed down, uninjured, for more than one hundred years, and now hangs as an antique ornament to grace the tap-room of one of John's descendants. The following is an exact copy of the proclamation, in the handwriting of the Governor or his Secretary:

1746. PROVINCE OF MASS. BAY.

By His Excellency the Governor.

I Do hereby authorize and impower John Boyen to beat his Drums anywhere within this Province, for enlisting Volunteers for His Majesty's service in a Regiment of Foot to be forthwith raised for the Service and Defence of the Island of Cape Breton, to be commanded by myself.

And the Colonels, with the other Officers of the Regiments within this Province, are hereby commanded not to give the said John Boyen any Obstruction or Molestation herein; but on the contrary Encouragement and assistance, for which this is a sufficient Warrant.

Given under my Hand at Boston the Nineteenth Day of May, in the Nineteenth Year of His Majesty's Reign. W. Shirley.

I hereby promise that whomsoever shall enlist into my regiment shall be discharged from it at the end of the Term for which he shall be enlisted, and will give any Man snch an assurance under my hand. W. Shirley.

A VEGETABLE CURIOSITY.

We have seen a new curiosity in the vegetable kingdom, which is becoming an object of interest to the fashionable world. We understand that many specimens of it have been sent to our National Institute. It is a nut, and called the "vegetable ivory, or nut of the ivory plant." The shell, or outer covering of the nut, is scarcely thicker than that of the common hazel, and of a similar color, and is so extremely hard that no instrument can readily make an impression on it. It is classed among the family of palms, and is common in the Mascareen islands, where it is called tagna plant. It is about half as large again as a horse chestnut. The kernel, in its early state, includes a limpid liquor, which becomes milky and sweet, and at length acquires the solidity of ivory, which it very much resembles in color, polish and consistency. The English are manufacturing a variety of fancy articles out of the nut, which is said to be superseding the elephant ivory. One quality of this nut is said to be, that its shavings may be boiled into a milky liquor, and not at all gelataneous; and we should not be astonished if some of our ingenious countrymen were to find out some method of reducing large masses of it to the liquid form, and then moulding it into beautiful ornaments of a size much larger than those which are made of the animal ivory.

The gutta percha and the ivory nut are probably not the only vegetable curiosities—susceptible of use, too—which may be found in the islands of the east, and which our enterprising commercial men may discover in the countries they may visit, and introduce into our arts.

Cholera and Magnetism.—In reference to this subject, says the Manchester Guardian, we have been favored with the following extract of a letter from St. Petersburgh, written by a gentleman well known in Manchester, to the firm here in which he is a partner: "A very important discovery has been made here very recently, which clearly proves that the malady is in the air, and that, therefore, quarantines are utterly useless. The air has a very singular effect on the magnetic power. Whilst the cholera was at its height, the action of the magnet was nearly neutralized, which, now the disease is gradually subsiding, assumes by degrees its former power. A magnet block, which used to carry 80lb, would, during the worst time of the cholera, not carry above 13lb. Its strength has now increased again to 60lb. The electro-magnetic telegraph at one time, would not work at all."

VARIETY.

The Hingham Patriot says the following most beautiful and touching inscription may be seen on a grave-stone in that town. The only words are these:

"OUR MOTHER,
Fell Asleep
NOV. 12, 1840.
When will the morning come?"

Simple, yet beautiful language!—language that shall find a response in every heart, made sad by the loss of that best and dearest of earthly friends—a mother. Many a faltering tongue has asked that most significant question, "When will the morning come?"

A duelist, who fancied himself insulted by a Yankee who had won the affections of his lady-love, left the room with the ominous words—"You will hear from me, sir!" "Well, do so!" replied the Yankee; "glad on 't, write once in a while; I shall be glad to hear from you as often as you're a mind to let us know how you get along."

President Jefferson once said:—"The habit of using ardent spirits, by men in office, has occasioned more injury to the public, and more trouble to me, than all other causes; and were I to commence my administration again, with the experience I now have, the first question I would ask, respecting a candidate, would be—Does he use ardent spirits?"

In the ancient Roman calendar the 24th of February is called Regifugium (the flight of the king,) because on that day Tarquin the Proud and his family were obliged to flee from Rome. It is remarkable that this is the very day on which Louis Philippe and his family were compeled to flee from Paris.

The loftiest mountain in the United States, east of the Mississippi, is in North Carolina. It is called Mitchell's Peak, and lies in Buncombe and Yancy counties. Its height is 6,720 feet above the level of the ocean—being nearly 500 feet higher that the White mountains in New Hampshire.

In Manchester, England, lately, a child, aged one year and eight months, was left at a table near a saucer containing fly poison. The child dipped its fingers in the poison and sucked them. It was in consequence seized with violent illness, and died in two or three days afterwards.

According to the most recent estimates, the population of Louisville, Ky., is now 46,600, the number of buildings, 7,000, and the value of property, real and personal, $13,047,514. The number of boats on the waters of the Mississippi valley is 467, having an aggregate tonnage of 132,566 tons.

The real estate of Brooklyn has increased in value during the past year, $1,860,866; and that of Williamsburg, $348,918. The total value of real estate in Brooklyne, on the 1st of August, 1848, was $27,598,126, and of Williamsburg, $3,271,720; of other parts of Kings Co., $2,902,637. Total real estate in Kings Co., $33,772,483.

It is very ridiculous for gentlemen to change sides with ladies at every corner, so as to give them the wall side of the walk, and to file out of a pew at church to let a platoon of women march up to the other end, but while the custom exists, women should go early to church. The former custom should be struck down at once, it is so foolish.

It is proposed to light up the city of London, all at one instant. This is to be done, by having one stop-cock for the main pipe, to let on and shut off the gas, and to have a wire connected with every lamp, to send an electric current to ignite the gas.

The correspondent of a New York paper, describing the incidents of the "four days" in Paris, gives the following item: The largest and finest battalion of Guarde Mobile I have seen during the day, was led by a full-blooded negro, tall and erect, and full of military ardor.

Champagne wine is at a discount in France. No orders have been received from Germany, and at Epernay and Rheims, millions of bottles lie unsold. Yet more is being made daily, and it may be had for a mere song. It is no longer an aristocratic beverage, since plebeians can indulge in it.

A Dutchman was relating his marvelous escape from drowning, when thirteen of his companions were lost by the upsetting of a boat, and he alone was saved. "And how did you escape their fate?" asked one of his hearers. "I tid not go in te poat!" was the Dutchman's placid answer.

A large glass of water, sipped ten drops at a time, in perfect silence, till the whole be taken, is said to be a convenient cure for a person in a passion. This is the last application of the water-cure.

Intemperance prevails to such an extent in England and Wales, that one hundred and sixty die daily of drunkenness. This fact is stated on the authority of a late report to Parliament.

Three estates of the Duke of Buckingham, comprising the whole of the parish of Hillesden, Bucks, 12,000 acres at Finmore, Oxon, and the hamlet of Falcott-cum-Aswell, Northamptonshire, have been sold for £216,400.

Some shrewd beggars are going about the country in the stolen or purchased old clothes of the volunteers, asking alms because they have fought for their country.

"I hold," says a western editor, with dignified emphasis, "I hold it, as a self-evident principle, that no man should take a newspaper three consecutive years without at least making an apology to the editor for not paying for it."

A negro undergoing an examination at Northampton, Mass., was asked if his master was a Christian, and replied, "No, sir, he's a member of Congress!"

Leisure is a very pleasant garment to look at, but it is a very bad one to wear. The ruin of millions may be traced to it.

The population of the United States is now estimated at 20,746,000, and the whole personal and real property at $8,594,560,000.

The expenses of the last session of Congress is estimated at more than $1,000,000.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

BOARD OF INSTRTCTION.

W. C. KENYON, A. M., } Principals.
IRA SAYLES, A. M., }

Assisted by nine able and experienced Teachers, five in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past ten years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to also continue to merit a share of public patronage

Extensive buildings are now erected for the accommodation of students, and for Recitation and Lecture Rooms, &c. They occupy an eligible position, and are finished in the best style of modern architecture; and the different apartments are heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical

Ladies and Gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board and rooms can also be had in private families, if particularly desired.

Each room for those who board in the Hall is furnished with a bed and bedding, a table, two chairs, and a pail.

The plan of instruction adopted in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the student, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars, prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The Health, the Manners, and the Morals of our Students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

REGULATIONS.

1. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.
2. Punctuality in attending all regular Academic exercises will be required.
3. The use of Tobacco, for chewing or smoking, will not be allowed either in or about the Academic buildings.
4. Playing at games of chance cannot be allowed.
5. Using profane language cannot be allowed.
6. The use of any kind of intoxicating drinks cannot be allowed, unless prescribed in case of sickness, by a regular physician.
7. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, cannot be permitted.
8. Gentlemen and ladies of the Institution will not be permitted to visit the rooms of the opposite sex, except in cases of imperious necessity, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.
9. Good order must be maintained at all times, and in all the rooms and halls of the Institution, and in all the intercourse of students with each other.
10. All students are required to retire regularly at the ringing of the bell designated for that purpose, as occasion may require; and to rise at the ringing of the morning bell, also designated.
11. Any room, occupied by students, will, at all times, be subject to the visitation of the Teachers of the Institution, who are required to see that the regulations are complied with.
12. Students will be required to keep their own rooms in good order, and to pay all unnecessary damages, either of rooms or of furniture furnished with the rooms.

REGULAR ACADEMIC EXERCISES.

The regular exercises, at which all the students will be required to attend, unless specially excused, are, Chapel exercises each morning during the term; Recitations, from two to four, five days each week, from Monday morning till Friday evening. Compositions and Declamations, one-half day, once in two weeks, Literary, Scientific, and Moral Lectures by the Principals. Public Worship, once in each week, either on Saturday or Sunday, according as the students may be in the habit of keeping the Sabbath, either on the seventh or first day of the week.

GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the students will be in the hands of the Principals, and will be strictly and steadily exercised, and at the same time, strictly parental. The object of our academic government being to secure the greatest possible amount of physical, intellectual, and moral good to the students themselves, regularity and order of exercises, and good and wholesome citizens to society. No unwarrantable means will be made use of to enforce the observance of the above regulations; yet our constant endeavor will be, to make the means resorted to as effective as human means may be.

Parents who place their children in this Institution, and all students who are sufficiently old to understand the necessity of order, cannot be too well assured that the foregoing regulations form the most essential part of the contract between them and us; and that whatever student wantonly violates them, and shows himself incorrigibly determined on pursuing his waywardness, will be expelled from the privileges of the Institution, and will not be permitted to re-enter it again, without special proof of reformation. Nor will an expelled student have any deduction made from full term charges.

Farther, parents are requested not to place money for expenses, in the hands of students who are not old enough to use money with discretion and economy. Either of the Principals, or the Book-keeper of the Institution, will act as fiscal guardian of such students without charge.

ADMISSION.

Candidates for admission as students, must present testimonials of good moral character, or be known to possess such a character, and must be willing to comply unreservedly with the foregoing regulations; and no one will be permitted to receive instructions in any class, until all academic bills, for the term in prospect, be paid or satisfactorily arranged.

ACADEMIC TERMS.

The Academic Year for 1848–9 consists of three terms, as follows:

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1848, and ending Thursday, November 23, 1848.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, December 5, 1848, and ending Thursday, March 15, 1849.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, April 3, 1849, and ending July 12, 1849.

As the plan of instruction in this Institution, laid out for each class, will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue through the term, and accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the terms.

N. B. Students who are expecting to teach during the winter or summer, will specify such intention on entering in the beginning of the fall or spring term; and, for the special accommodation of such, a day will be set apart at first, on which they can leave, if they wish; and they will not be permitted to leave on any other day, nor will any other than teachers be permitted to leave on the day specified.

Farther, it is of the utmost importance that the student be present at the day of the opening of the term, as on that and the succeeding day, the students entering are examined and classified.

It is also suggested to parents who patronize this Institution from the distance of a few miles around, that students should go home only once during the term, as every absence from classes is always attended with disadvantages to the student. This is a suggestion, and not imperative. But to meet this suggestion, the exercise of the school will close at noon on the seventh Friday in each term, and open again on the afternoon of Monday following.

EXPENSES.

THE JUDGES JUDGED—NO. 8.

It has occurred to us, that the several contradictory positions assumed by the judges of the same court, and of the different courts which have had the subject before them, put in juxtaposition the one to the other, present as clear a case of self-destruction as the annals of history have ever recorded. If Sunday coercionists rely at all upon the views and decisions of State judiciaries for the support of their cause, then is it not only self-destroyed, but eaten up to the very tail. If the same discrepancy exists in the meaning and character of any other of our laws, in the courts of the land, we are not informed thereof. A cause so ill-sustained, is neither honorable, nor efficient for any useful purpose. This very discrepancy itself must make it work unevenly, according to the various views to which the magistracy may be inclined. This entire want of uniformity in interpreting and enforcing these laws, shows the necessity of their receiving adjudication from a higher, a national court. When intelligent and capable men, engaged to defend a particular theory, assign reasons so various and contradictory for the same thing, there is strong presumptive evidence, in that fact, that the theory itself is wrong; and when several courts give opposing decisions upon the meaning and application of the same principle in law, to cases of a like character, it is obvious that the reasons assigned for that principle are not conclusive. And until reasons can be assigned, sufficiently conclusive to secure uniformity in their operation, and the decisions of the courts, such laws ought to be null and void. That this is the case with the Sunday laws, is proved by the following positions of the courts which have had this subject before them.

Judge Bell—"No man, living under the protection of our institutions, can be coerced to profess any form of religious belief, or to practice any peculiar mode of worship, in preference to another. In this respect the Christian, the Jew, the Mohammedan, and the Pagan, are alike entitled to protection."

Judge Coulter—"We are a Christian people and State; we are part and parcel of a great Christian nation. All over the length and breadth of this great nation, the Christian Sabbath is recognized, and guarded by the law as a day of sacred rest. Our national Congress recognizes it."

Chief Justice Gibson—"The right of conscience, as understood under our organic law, is simply a right to worship the Supreme Being according to the dictates of the heart; to adopt any creed or hold any opinion whatever, or to support any religion; and to do, or forbear to do, any act for conscience sake, the doing or forbearing of which is not prejudicial to the public weal."

Judge Coulter—"Like water that flows, and the air we breathe, the Sabbath of rest, when the bondman and the free, the master and the apprentice, and all men, meet in equality at the Christian altar, comes to us secured by the very organization of society, and the formation of the social compact. And it is therefore protected and guarded by our laws."

Congressional Committee—"Congress acts under a Constitution of delegated and limited powers. The Committee look in vain to that instrument for a delegation of power authorizing this body to inquire and determine what part of time, or whether any, has been set apart by the Almighty for religious purposes. On the contrary, among the few prohibitions which it contains, is one that prohibits a religious test; and another, which declares that Congress shall pass no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

Judge Coulter—"General Christianity enters into the very frame of our social existence; it is part of the common law of the State."

Judge Bell—"It cannot be said a primary object of the act was, authoritatively, to assert the supremacy of Sunday as of divine appointment."

Judge Coulter—"It is one of the primitive institutions of Christianity—one, on the existence of which, its continuance depends."

Judge Bell—"As I have said, the selection of the day of rest is but a question of expediency."

Judge Coulter—"The statute declares it to be the Lord's day."

Judge Bell—"The law intends no preference."

Judge Coulter—"It comes to us as a holy day from the very dawn of our existence as a people, and was so regarded by the people from whom we sprung since the days of King Athelstane."

Judge Bell—"Yet this does not change the character of the enactment. It is still, essentially, but a civil regulation, made for the government of man as a member of society."

Judge Coulter—"I do not recognize the right of legislation, to make a day of secular cessation from labor, independent of the Christian Sabbath."

Judge Bell—"They may be established by common consent, or, as is conceded, the legislative power of the State may, without impropriety, interfere to fix the time of their stated return."

Judge Coulter—"Why should the Supreme Court not regard it as our forefathers regarded it?"

Judge Bell—"Its sole mission is to inculcate a temporary weekly cessation from labor, but it adds not to this requirement any religious obligation."

Judge Coulter—"I wish it distinctly understood, that I believe the laws constitutional, because they guard the Christian Sabbath from profanation, and in the language of the Act of 1794, prohibit work, or worldly employment, on the Lord's day."

Judge Bell—"Had such been the intent, irrespective of its statutory character as a day of rest from secular employment, its framers would not have stopped short with a bare interdiction of labor and worldly amusements. Following the example afforded by older states and communities, they would have commanded the performance of religious rites, or at least some express recognition of the day as the true Sabbath."

Judge Coulter—"All the State Legislatures recognize it. Every convention of the people, for the establishment of State or United States Constitutions, recognized and regarded it as a day of sacred rest. All our courts, national or State, so regard it. William Penn, in the form of government and laws which he brought over to regulate the people of the new colony, so regarded it, and enacted that as such it should be observed, as a day for worshiping the Almighty, in imitation of the primitive disciples."

Judge Bell—"Such a requisition, we agree with the plaintiff in error, would be a palpable interference with the rights of conscience. But nothing like this is exacted. On the contrary, every one is left at full liberty to shape his own convictions, and practically to assert them to the free exercise of his religious views."

We have here transposed those quotations from the order in which they were given to the world. But we are not aware of giving them a sense not intended by their authors, in a single instance. By an examination of the original documents, we believe it will be seen, that there they convey the very sentiments they speak in this article; and so far as we are able to judge, their authors intended to neutralize each others sentiments in this very way. We acknowledge we make a use of them which they did not intend; but in all controversies we believe the disputants have this privilege; and that it is considered fair and honorable to turn an opponent's positions to one's own advantage when it can be done in truth. In their judgment of this case, the judges appear to have been agreed in but one thing; that was, to sustain the Act of the Legislature. Their sentiments respecting it, are as opposite to each other as were the sentiments of the Puritans and the Court of James 1. of England. They are men of some foresight, and each covering the defect of his own position by his prepossessions, sees the untenable character of the other. Judge Bell sees plainly enough, that for the law "to assert the supremacy of Sunday as of divine appointment," "would be a palpable interference with the rights of conscience." Judge Coulter sees equally clear, that the object of the law was to "guard the Christian Sabbath from profanation," and that "the statute declares it to be the Lord's day." Put the two together, and the Judges of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania have declared the statute an infraction of the constitutional provision, claimed by the plaintiff, consequently null and void. Judge Coulter sees plainly enough, that to admit "the right of legislation to make a day of secular cessation from labor, independent of the Christian Sabbath," is to destroy its sacred character, and remove it from its supposed divine sanctions. Judge Bell says, "The selection of the day of rest is but a question of expediency." Between them both the sanctity of Sunday falls to the ground; and the Sunday worker is acquitted of transgressing any rightful law, human or divine. Farther, the published "Opinion" of the Court declares the Act of Assembly of 1794, "essentially but a civil regulation;" the minority report of Judge Coulter denies the right of the Legislature to make such a regulation. Put this and that together, and the Court have declared the Act in question unconstitutional. This is as we believe; and without designing it, the Court have sustained every important position assumed by the plaintiff, although they gave judgment against him.

GIVING THE GOSPEL A PUSH.

An Indian of the Wyandot tribe, attending a monthly concert, and hearing what missions had done for other tribes, rose and said, "When he thought of all that had been done by the missionaries, his heart was almost too full for him to speak. They had come to his tribe about the same time that others went to the Choctaws. But they met a very cold reception. In a council of the nation they were advised to go away. They were told that their religion did not suit the Indian—that their God was not the God of the white man. But they persevered, and God blessed them; and the result with them—the most northern tribe—had been the same as just described by his brother from the most southern. They too had their missionary society; and when the first member, an old warrior, laid down his subscription. 'There,' said he, 'take that, and give the gospel another push.' And so should we all feel, when we contribute of our substance or our endeavors. We are giving the gospel another push, until, by the blessing of God, it will encompass the earth, and fill every land with thanksgiving and praise."

HOPE FOR THE MOURNERS.

BY BERNARD BARTON.

"But it shall come to pass that at evening time it shall be light."—Zech. xiv. 7.

We journey through a vale of tears,
  By many a cloud o'ercast;
And worldly cares, and worldly fears,
  Go with us to the last
Not to the last! Thy word hath said,
  Could we but read aright,
"Poor pilgrim, lift in hope thy head,
  At eve it shall be light!

"Though earth-born shadows now may shroud
  Thy thorny path awhile,
God's blessed word can part each cloud,
  And bid the sunshine smile,
Only believe, in living faith,
  His love and power divine,
And ere thy sun shall set in death
  His light shall round thee shine.

"When tempest clouds are dark on high,
  His bow of love and peace
Shines sweetly in the vaulted sky,
  Betokening storms shall cease.
Hold on thy way, with hope unchilled,
  By faith and not by sight,
And thou shalt own his word fulfilled,
  At eve it shall be light."

☞ The following article was placed in our hands with a somewhat urgent request for its publication. We make room for it under an impression that it will serve one good purpose, if no other, and that is of securing the perusal of many interesting texts of Scripture. The reader will perceive, that among these texts are some upon which each party in the controversy about the Godhead relies for the support of its theory. Whether, in such circumstances, he will feel any better qualified, after reading them than before, to judge of the opinions of the writer, is a question with which we do not care to meddle.

Whereas, it has been said of me, that I am a Unitarian, I have therefore thought proper to give my views in writing in regard to the person, character, and office of the Lord Jesus Christ, and let every one judge for himself whether I am a Unitarian or not.

Wm. Stillman.

First, then, I will say, I believe that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one; for though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many and lords many,) but to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him. Howbeit, there is not in every man that knowledge. 1 Cor. 8 : 4—7. I believe that God is one. Gal. 3 : 20. (Not three.) I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. Matt. 16 : 16. I believe he was the beginning of the creation God. Rev. 3 : 14. I believe he is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature. Col. 1 : 15. I believe he was made a quickening spirit. 1 Cor. 15 : 45. I believe he was made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they. Heb. 1 : 4. I believe that God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow and every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Phil. 2 : 9—11. Hence I believe he is the Lord from heaven. 1 Cor. 15 : 47. Because his name is called the mighty God, the everlasting Father, and the Prince of Peace. Isa. 9 : 6. Again, his name is called the Lord our righteousness. Jer. 23 : 6. And again, his name is called the Word of God. Rev. 19 : 13. I believe that in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God; all things were made by him and without him was not any thing made that was made. John 1 : 1—3. I believe that in him was life, and that life was the light of men. John 1 : 4. I believe the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among men, and they beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father full of grace and truth. John 1 : 18. I believe he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham, that in all things he might be made like unto his brethren. Heb. 2 : 16. I believe he being in the form of God thought it not robbery to be equal with God. Phil. 2 : 6. I believe his Father is greater than he. John 14 : 28. I believe the Son can do nothing of himself. John 5 : 9. But the Father that dwelleth in him, he doeth the works. John 14 : 10. I believe he that hath seen the Son hath seen the Father. John 14 : 9. I believe no man hath seen God at any time; the only begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him. John 1 : 18. I believe that all power in heaven and in earth was given unto the Son of God. Matt. 28 : 18. (I believe the eternal, self-existent God never had any power given to him, nor to any part of him.) I believe the Son came from God and went to God, knowing that the Father had given all things into his hand. John 13 : 3. I believe he proceeded forth and came from God, neither came he of himself; but God sent him. John 8 : 42. Why do ye not understand my speech? John 8 : 43. I believe he came not to do his own will but the will of him that sent him. John 6 : 38. I believe that in him dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily. Col. 2 : 9. I believe Christians, being rooted and grounded in love, might be filled with all the fullness of God. Eph. 3 : 17—19. I believe there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time. 1 Tim. 2 : 5, 6. I believe a mediator is not a meditor of one, but God is one. Gal. 3 : 20. I believe he was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed. Isa. 53 : 5. I believe he was before all things, before the floods, before he had made the highest parts of the dust of the world, he was with God as one brought up with him, and was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him. I believe he died for our sins according to the Scriptures, 1 Cor. 15 : 3, and was raised again for our justification. Rom. 4 : 25. I believe that in him we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of his grace. Eph. 1 : 7. By whom also we have now received the atonement. Rom. 5 : 11. For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his son, much more being reconciled we shall be saved by his life. Rom. 5 : 10. I believe there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved. Acts 4 : 12. I believe he is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them; for such an high priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, and was made higher than the heavens. Heb. 7 : 25, 26. I believe all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father, for the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son. John 5 : 22, 23. For he hath made him to be sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. 1 Cor. 15 : 21. I believe the Lord is well pleased for his righteousness sake, he hath magnified the law and made it honorable. Isa. 42 : 21. I believe he hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us. Gal. 3 : 13. I believe he and his Father are one. John 10 : 30. I believe also that all the children of God are one in Christ Jesus. Gal. 3 : 28. Even as Christ and his Father are one. John 17 : 22. That they all may be one, as thou Father art in me and I in thee, that they also may be one in us. Verse 21. I believe also what John said was true, viz: And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding that we may know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his son Jesus Christ. This is the true God and eternal life. 1 John 5 : 20. I believe he that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son; and this is the record that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. 1 John 5 : 10, 11. For I believe that as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself. John 5 : 26. So that as the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, even so the Son quickeneth whom he will. John 5 : 21. For the Father loveth the Son, and sheweth him all things that himself doeth. John 5 : 20. For the Son can do nothing of himself but what he seeth the Father do, for what things soever he doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise. Verse 19. I believe that when he ascended up on high he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men; now that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth; he that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things. Eph. 4 : 8—10. I believe that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church. Eph. 1 : 17, 22. I believe the head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God. 1 Cor. 11 : 3. I believe great is the mystery of godliness, God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up to glory. 1 Tim. 3 : 16. I believe then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God even the Father, when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power, for he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet; the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death, for he hath put all things under his feet; but when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted which did put all things under him, and when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that did put all things under him, that God may be all in all. 1 Cor. 15 : 24, 28. In short, I believe every word the Bible has said about it. And he that believes any thing more or less about it than all that the Bible says, is welcome to all the benefit he will ever get by it. Hence I believe that as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment; so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation. Heb. 9 : 27, 28. For though he were a son, yet learned he obedience by the things that he suffered, and being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him. Heb. 5 : 8, 9. Even so come Lord Jesus. Amen. Rev. 22 : 20.

A REMARKABLE DREAM.

In a sermon delivered by the Rev. John Jukes, of Bedford, occasioned by the death of a venerable deacon of the church under his care, Mr. Thomas Kilpin, the following facts are mentioned in reference to an aged grandmother to whom Mr. Kilpin was much indebted for spiritual advantages in early life:

'She was originally a member of the church of which Dr. Doddridge was the pastor at Northampton. The privileges enjoyed by her in connection with his ministry were much valued; and when in the course of time she removed with her husband to another part of the country, less favored with the means of grace, she deeply felt and much deplored her loss. But she sought, by the private exercises of religion, to make up, as far as possible, for the want of its public ordinances. She was much with God in secret, pleading for herself and for her family; and He who seeth in secret, has since rewarded her openly. On one occasion, after having been thus employed, she had a dream which afforded her much encouragement in after life, and appears so remarkable, when viewed in connection with subsequent events, that it not only deserves, but demands, a place in this brief narrative. She dreamed that whilst engaged in earnest prayer for her family, an angel appeared to her and said, 'What is thy petition?' She replied, 'Lord, that my husband may live before thee.' The answer given was, 'What I do, thou knowest not now, but shall know hereafter.' The question, 'What is thy petition?' was repeated, and she then said, 'Lord, that my children may live before thee,' to which she received the gracious reply, 'All thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children.' Once more was the question, 'What is thy petition?' put to her, and she was emboldened farther to ask, 'Lord, that my grand-children may also live before thee.' The animating response, 'Thy children's children shall be a seed to serve me,' was immediately added to those before received. The declarations thus conveyed to her mind, were all, in due time, literally fulfilled. There was satisfactory evidence of the decided piety of all her children and grand-children. Her husband also was converted, but not until after her death, so that she had not the satisfaction of knowing it on earth. No less than sixteen of the descendants of this devoted woman have been, at different times, in fellowship with the church assembling in this place. Oh, who can fully estimate the importance of female influence, when under the full control of religious principle? If Christian wives and Christian mothers would all strive to imitate the example now before us, what might we not anticipate as the result!'

THE ORATOR AND NEWSPAPER.

Compare the orator, one of the noblest vehicles for the diffusion of thought, with the newspaper, and we may gain a faint glimpse of the ubiquitous power of the latter. The orator speakes but to a few hundreds, the newspaper addresses millions. The words of the orator may die on the air, the language of the newspaper is stamped on tablets imperishable as marble. The arguments of the orator may follow each other so rapidly that a majority of the audience may struggle in a net of ratiocination; the reasoning of the newspaper may be scanned at leisure without a fear of perplexity. The passion of the orator influences an assembly, the feeling of a newspaper electrifies a continent. The orator is for an edifice, the newspaper for the world; the one shines for an hour, the other glows for all time. The orator may be compared to lightning, which flashes over a valley for a moment, but it leaves it again in darkness; the newspaper to a sun blazing steadily over the whole earth, and "fixed on the basis of its own eternity." Printing has been happily defined "the art which preserves all arts." Printing makes the orator more than an orator. It catches up his dying words, and breathes into them the breath of life. It is the speaking gallery through which the orator thunders in the ears of ages. He leans from the tomb over the cradle of rising generations. Nor does the art confine its patronage to him alone. The evanescent thougn gorgeous visions of the poet are preserved.

"That softer falls
Than petals from blown roses on the grass,
Or night dews on still waters beneath walls
Of shadowy granite in a gloomy pass;
Music that gentler on the spirit lies
Than tired eyeballs upon tired eyes;
Music that brings sweet sleep down from
The blissful skies!"

LOSS OF CHARACTER.

Robert Andrews, foreman to a respectable nurseryman at some distance from Philadelphia, who had lived with his employer ten years, and had a good character, one Saturday night, after applying for his wages, claimed pay for a young man up to that day, whom he had discharged some day before. His master said, looking him steadily in the face, 'Robert, do you want to cheat me, by asking wages for a man that you discharged eight days ago?' He had no sooner said this, than the miserable conscience-stricken man's blood forsook his face, as if he had been stabbed to the heart. When his master saw him so much affected, he told him that he might still labor as he had done, but after such a manifestly dishonest attempt, his character and the confidence in it, were gone forever. On Monday, Robert made his appearance, but was utterly an altered man. The agitation of his mind had reduced his body to the feebleness of an infant's. He took his spade and tried to use it, but in vain; and it was with difficulty that he reached home. He went to bed immediately; medical aid was procured, but to no purpose, and the poor fellow sunk under the sense of his degradation, and expired on Wednesday afternoon! His neighbors who attended him, say, that a short time before he died, he declared, that the agony consequent on the loss of his character as an honest man, which he had for so many years maintained, was the sole cause of his death.

Nervous Excitement.—The effect of nervous excitement is illustrated in the case of Miss Martineau, in her visit to the great Egyptian pyramid. The reader should be aware that Miss Martineau is so very deaf, as to be unable to hear ordinary conversation without the aid of an ear trumpet. In describing her visit she remarks: "I was unwilling to carry my trumpet up the pyramid—knocking against the stones, while I wanted my hands for climbing. So I left it below in the hands of a trusty Arab. When I joined my party at the top of the pyramid, I never remembered my trumpet; nor did they; and we talked as usual during the forty minutes we were there, without my ever missing it. When I came down, I never thought of it; and I explored the inside, came out and lunched, and still never thought of my trumpet, till, at the end of three hours and a half from my parting with it, I saw it in the hands of the Arab, and was reminded of the astonishing fact I had heard as well without it as with it, all that time. Such a thing never happened before, and probably never will again; and a stronger proof could not be offered of the engrossing interest of a visit to the pyramid."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, September 28, 1848.

From Zion's Advocate, of Aug. 12.

THE SABBATH.

In the Advocate of July 29th, I observe a piece from the Puritan, which excites some inquiry. Reference is there had to a treatise by Dr. Wardlaw, in which he gives such an interpretation of Heb. 4: 9, 10, as to make it an express assertion that the law of the Sabbath is binding on Christians. This I should hope no one would doubt. How can any one doubt it, who regards the fourth commandment? And who is prepared to offer a reason why the fourth commandment is not as binding, touching the observance of the Sabbath, as is the third, touching profanity, or the sixth, touching murder, or the eighth, touching theft? That the observance of the Sabbath is binding upon all who possess the law of God, is very evident, and that the Sabbath is made, in the above passage, to represent that future rest which awaits the children of God in a glorified state, is equally clear; but that it can with equal clearness be made to decide the question whether we are accustomed to observe the right day or not, may be seriously questioned.

The writer has the following remarks:—"As when God finished his work of creation, the day of his resting was sanctified as a sabbatism, or day commemorative of rest, and religious exercise; so, when Christ finished his work of new creation, and rested from it in his resurrection, that day of his rest was in all coming time to be sanctified as a day of holy rest and commemoration."

Query. Upon what authority is this declaration made? Is not this rather a strained remark? "When Christ finished his work of new creation, and rested from it in its resurrection." Why not say he rested from his work while he lay in the grave? Why call his resurrection a rest?—and especially the first day of it? And why say that first day of it, more than succeeding ones? And more than all, why say that first day of the resurrection was to be in all coming time sanctified as a day of holy rest and commemoration? Is there any intimation of such a thing, in all that the Saviour taught? If so, where is it? In what chapter and verse is it found? Again, the writer remarks: And on the first day of the week Jesus arose from the dead, and rested from the work which he had done; wherefore the ascended Lord blessed the first day and sanctified it. May it not be asked again, whence such assertions? Who has authorized them? Where, in the New Testament, are we told that the Saviour blessed the first day of the week and sanctified it? Did he rest on that day?

Some of us have been told, from our childhood, that the sprinkling of children, down to this time, should be practiced in lieu of Jewish circumcision. But who now believes it? Those who have been taught to follow tradition, instead of the teachings of God's word.

And now, as it respects our Saviour's blessing and sanctifying the first day of the week, that we should ever after make it our Sabbath day, instead of the "Sabbath of the Lord our God," the observance of which is solemnly enjoined upon us in the fourth commandment, what evidence have we of it? Will the Advocate of our Zion tell us? This is a subject on which more light would be desirable. It is hoped that the Editor, or some of his able correspondents, will furnish so much light on this interesting and important matter as will prove a blessing to those who wish to remember and keep holy the Sabbath day.

A SINCERE INQUIRER FOR THE RIGHT.

UNION, Me., Aug. 1, 1848.

Remarks by the Editor of the Advocate.

We cordially sympathize with all which our correspondent has written on the obligations of the fourth commandment; and on the importance of the Sabbath; and also on the importance of following implicitly the divine word in its observance. We can also easily understand that sincere and conscientious men may be perplexed as to the proper day or date of the sacred rest. The human mind is prone on this subject, as on many others, to crave a degree of light which divine wisdom has not seen fit to impart to men. In Gen. 2: 3, we are informed that God blessed and sanctified, or set apart to a sacred use, the seventh day. "The seventh day is the Sabbath." Ex. 20: 10. Some persons, upon reading these and similar passages, take it for granted that they know exactly where to find the seventh day—they think they know just where it begins, and where it ends. But is it so? A seventh day implies six preceding days. Where, and at what time, are these six days to begin? It may be said that they are to begin with the week. But when is the week to begin? The revolutions of the moon may help us to the date of a month—and the revolutions of the sun may help us to the date of a year. But neither sun, nor moon, nor stars, help us to any such date as a week. We suppose that the division of time into weeks is an effect of the Sabbath, and so cannot be a foundation for it.

It is often said that the original Sabbath was the seventh day of the week—and some persons seem to think that the Bible says so. But no one can find in the Bible any passage containing such a declaration. The opinion rests on tradition, not on the Bible. A careful examination will show that the Bible uniformly speaks of the seventh day as following six days of labor. God's labor in making the world was six days—then he rested on the seventh day. This first Sabbath was the first day of man's complete existence; and of course it was the first day of man's first week on earth. The second Sabbath on earth was the first day of man's second week—and so on, if we could pursue the calculation, down to the present time. But such a calculation must, in the nature of things, be attended with great uncertainty. Who will undertake to prove that in the time of Moses the people had always kept up a regular calculation of weeks from the creation? Obviously the fourth commandment is not founded on any such calculation. It is a simple command that a day of sacred rest shall follow six days of labor. "Six days shalt thou labor—but the seventh day, i. e. the day that follows the six days of labor, is the Sabbath." See also Ex. 31: 19. "Six days may work be done; but the seventh is the Sabbath of rest." See also Deut. 5: 12–14.

There is another difficulty which the advocates of the seventh day of the week have never been able to explain. They have never been able to show how it is possible to observe as the sacred rest the same absolute time all over the earth. When it is noon with us, it is midnight on the opposite side of the earth. Their day begins when our day ends, and ends when our day begins. In the nature of things, the Sabbath must begin at as many different times as there are different degrees of longitude on the earth. Yet the great principle of a day of sacred rest after six of labor is as easily observed in one spot on earth as another; and so is equally applicable to men in all parts of the world. This, we think, always has been and still is the proper idea of the Sabbath.

Our correspondent quotes a passage from the Puritan, and asks on what authority its declarations are made. Our reply is, that we understand the writer in the Puritan to be giving a paraphrase of Heb. 4: 10. He would, of course, refer to that passage as his "authority." The writer in the Puritan, as we understand him, supposes that Paul, in Heb. 4: 10, regarded the time of Christ's life on earth as days of labor—then his time of sleep in the grave as the night of sleep that follows days of labor—then the morning of his resurrection as the commencement of his sacred rest.

"Six days shalt thou labor." Does any man, of ordinary understanding, in any part of the earth, have any difficulty in finding when these days begin, or when they end? If not, why need we have any trouble in finding when a seventh day—a seventh portion of time—is to begin, or end? If such a practice is in actual or professed observance in the country where we dwell, what good reason can be given why we should attempt to change it. If those around us cut short the Sabbath, and do not devote to its sacred purposes full twenty-four hours, then we have a good reason why we should go beyond them in the length of our sacred rest—or if they do not observe the sacred hours in a proper and scriptural way, then we have a good reason why we should differ from them in our manner of keeping holy that day—or, if a few men, from a love of singularity, or from a misguided conscience, should attempt to keep another day, differing from that usually observed, there are good and sufficient reasons why we should not imitate them. But if we sacredly observe one seventh portion of time—and observe it in accordance with our fellow-worshipers, we find in it the proper purpose of a day of sacred rest.

☞ The foregoing queries were propounded by an intelligent Baptist preacher, and the reply to them was written by a veteran Baptist editor. The queries do not surprise us, because they are such as might be expected to rise in the mind of every "sincere inquirer after the right." But the reply, we must confess, somewhat surprises us, coming as it does from a Baptist editor—a representative of that denomination of Christians who profess above all others to build their faith on the Word of God. "Inquirer" wants to know upon what authority it is asserted, that the day of Christ's resurrection "was in all coming time to be sanctified as a day of holy rest and commemoration." And what answer does he get? Why, he is told, in the first place, that "the human mind is prone, on this subject, to crave a degree of light which divine wisdom has not seen fit to impart to man"—a strange sort of caution, surely, for a Baptist to give to an inquirer in relation to a plain and positive precept. In the next place, he is told, that notwithstanding God has said, "The seventh day is the Sabbath," and has commanded all men to keep it holy, still there is so much uncertainty about which is the seventh day, that the command should be understood to mean only "that a day of rest shall follow six days of labor"—as though God had commanded men to keep the seventh day, and yet left them in such ignorance about the day as to render obedience impossible! Finally, he is told, by way of justifying the notion that the command only requires a day of rest after six days of labor, that it is not possible for men in all parts of the world to observe the same absolute time—a fact which has about as much weight against the seventh day being the Sabbath, as the fact that water is scarce in the desert of Sahara has against immersion being the true mode of baptism. And this is palmed off as an answer to the question upon what authority it is asserted that the day of Christ's resurrection was in all coming time to be sanctified as a day of holy time! We scarcely need say, that it is just no answer at all. It is at best only a sort of palaver about the matter, serving to foster an impression that the question can be answered satisfactorily to the observers of the first day, while in fact it darkens counsel without knowledge.

The notion that the law of the Sabbath does not specify what day shall be observed, but only requires a day of rest after six days of labor, will not stand the test of investigation. In the second chapter of Genesis we are told that "God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his works." In the fourth commandment we are told that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." In examining these passages, together with the various others relating to the subject which occur in the Scriptures, we are struck with the fact that in every change of enunciation, the Sabbath is invariably described as the seventh day—as a day exclusively so designated, and universally so recognized. This form of expression, which is quite as emphatic in the original Hebrew as it is in our translation, is not equivalent to the indefinite phrase "a seventh day," as it is frequently misrepresented, but stands out in striking contrast to it. Any day of the week may be a seventh, but one alone can be the seventh. And yet we continually hear that the point of the command is not literally to keep the seventh day, but the Sabbath—that the particular day is merely an incidental, and not an essential provision of the statute—and that one day may be considered as much the seventh day as another, since there is nothing in the law to determine how the enumeration shall be regulated, or to restrict the observance to any one day by its distinctive name. Such expedients to weaken the power of language, indicate a struggle to defend what long custom has made familiar—a predisposition not to vindicate the right, but to extenuate a wrong. The man who gathered sticks upon the Sabbath day was stoned to death for this violation of the statute, Moses himself being the judge. It would be difficult to justify this severity, if the particular day to be regarded was indifferent to the law. The offender would no doubt very willingly have observed Sunday as a vicarious Sabbath, if executive clemency had indulged him with the opportunity. But who will venture to affirm, that it would have formed a valid defense, if the convict had replied to the accusation against him, that the point of the command was not literally to keep the seventh day—that the particular day was merely an incidental—and that one day might be considered as much the seventh as another? We appeal to every candid reader, and ask if you can have a moment's doubt as to the propriety or success of such a vindication? We believe you cannot. Indeed, the very reason assigned by the law, "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and rested the seventh day," clearly indicates that the selection referred to the concluding portion of an established series—to a rest following upon and closing a period of labor. Any other order of arrangement would have conflicted with the distinctive character of the institution as a Sabbath. To say that resting on the first day, and working on the succeeding six days of the same division of time, constitute an observance of the fourth commandment and an imitation of God's example, is a gross abuse of language, which would countenance the most flagrant evasions of law.

In regard to the notion, that it is impossible certainly to determine which is the seventh day from the creation, we have only to say, that it is a matter of not the slightest practical importance to those who receive the fourth commandment, how many days had elapsed between the creation and the time of its promulgation. If Moses really knew which was "the seventh day from the creation," which we hear so much about, he probably instructed the Israelites in it, and required them to keep it; if he did not know, still he gave them the law, and enforced its observance on the seventh day. We read that the Israelites, after having been miraculously supplied with manna for six days, found none on the seventh day; (Exod. 16: 27;) and unless we deny the miracle entirely, it will be difficult to elude the admission that He who gave the periodical supply, knew best what day he wished his people to observe. The doubt, and the argument built upon it, would come with a much better grace from an Infidel than from a Christian.

As to the difficulty of keeping the same absolute time all over the world, it must suffice for us to remark, that if it has any force upon this subject, it is not against the seventh day, but against any portion time set apart for a sabbatic purpose. It does not surprise us to hear this difficulty dilated upon by those who deny the obligation to keep any day of the week as a Sabbath. But to hear it from such a stickler for the observance of the first day as the Editor of Zion's Advocate, does astonish us. Until he is ready to charge God with folly in commanding the observance of a particular day of the week for the Sabbath, we should recommend him to be careful about using this weapon, unless, as in the present case, he connect it with a distinct declaration that he is for keeping a Sabbath, which otherwise would not be believed.

MUSIC—NO. 1.

All creation is musical. Nature chants a voiceless song, rich in melody, subduing in harmony, heard alike in the whispering breeze and rushing tornado—the gushing rill and tumbling torrent—in the plaintive sigh of the trembling reed, and the startling creak of the mountain pine. Old ocean's wave, with Niagara's tumbling foam echoed in rolling thunder from the clouds, swell the solid base in nature's chorus. The voice of song harmonious rings from every mountain side, and forest deep, to hail the rising day, while every valley chants a pensive lay to her departing hours. The bird of night hails the pale-faced moon and smiling stars in song, tuned in unison with the hoarse bay of the bandog as he responds to the weary tread of the belated night-traveler. The chime of the curfew calls the weary herdsman from his careful vigils, as it mingles with the plaintive notes of the lowing herds. Thus nature, inanimate and irrational, joins in ecstatic strains of praise to the Great First Cause.

But is man's soul deaf to all the cheer of nature's general song? Tarnished indeed must be the original susceptibilities of that soul which is unsubdued by the melting strains of nature's voice. The child is soothed by the melody of the mother's voice, and the unperverted soul is alive to all the influences which cheered its childhood hours. O there is a melting tenderness in the human voice, more potent to heal the woes of earth than all the nostrums the apothecary hath ever devised. Who has not felt the potency of a consoling word, when grief pressed sore upon the heart? But if that word had been uttered in the cold, harsh tones of indifference, it would have chilled the soul. Cicero never led captive assemblies by the force of argument alone; he wielded a more powerful weapon; the music of his voice, chiming with vividness of thought, chained the soul. Who does not long for the day when music of a chaste and exalted character shall go forth, like a spirit of peace, on the wings of the wind, to cheer, to bless, and to save from the woes of man's varied conditions?—when the notes of the bugle and drum, which wake the turbid passions and urge men on to carnage, shall give place to the melody of the human voice, which shall awaken the kindest emotions, and thus conduce to benevolence?

There is music in heaven. God has recognized it as a part of his worship, and enjoined upon all to unite in such worship, thus making it obligatory upon all to sing, instead of leaving it discretionary, as many would feign believe. From the earliest period of recorded time, has music had the sanction of Heaven, by being associated with every thing holy; but, shame to man! it is made to subserve the ends of sin, and lead the captive to ruin by its resistless power. The music of America is yet in its infancy, undecked by sweet Italian art. In Venice, the evening hour is whiled away by the mellow song of some distant gondolier, as he sings to the beat of his bending oar, while ever and anon the well-known strain is caught and echoed back o'er the moon-light wave from the height of some far-off balcony. In Rome, the voice of song from the seven hills ushers in the day, while from the Tiber's placid surface the strain is prolonged. From Scotia's heither hills the distant shepherd's song winds its lengthened way in perpetuation of Scotland's fallen chiefs. The lonely exile from Erin's green isle, sings in fanciful communion with loved ones far away. The Switzer sings of his snow-clad hills and fertile vales. The weary pilot sings to the dashing spray, and wind-beaten sailors recount the scenes of home in song, as high in air they bend the creaking cord.

> "Thou, O music, can assuage the pain and heal the wound
> Which hath defied the skill of sager comforters;
> Thou dost restrain each wild emotion;
> Thou dost the rage of angry passions chill,
> Or lightest up the flame of holy fire,
> As through the soul thy strains harmonious ring."

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER OF BRO. CARPENTER.

The manner of commencing their year furnishes a favorable opportunity for taking a peep at the social habits of the Chinese. I was struck with the similarity of the custom here and in New York. The principal difference is, that instead of one day, the Chinese spend five days in paying their compliments to each other. During all this time all business is as completely at a stand as it is in New York on New Year's day. Every body almost is in the streets, dressed in their finest apparel. Such a display of furs and silks I have never seen elsewhere. They generally, I think, make short calls and leave their cards. They also leave cards where they do not call, but where they intend to call, or at the houses of those with whom they desire to live on terms of friendship. Some of our neighbors called on us; some sent their cards. We called on three or four families, enough to see their manner of receiving and entertaining not only us, but others. Each house is provided with a reception-room, always on the basement—(most of the houses are one story)—furnished with chairs, tables, &c., but worst of all with some of the ensigns of idolatry, such as candles, incense, and pictures. The guests are immediately supplied with tea, and a variety of light nicely-got-up articles to please the taste. But the pipe always precedes every thing else. When the visitor departs, the host accompanies him to the door, when they bow twice very gracefully, putting their hands together, with their sleeves extending six or eight inches beyond their hands.

Jan. 26.—In my walk this morning, I saw a poor beggar pick up a dead dog which lay by the side of the path almost concealed from view, and make off with it. It was a sad sight. Inquiring of a bystander if he supposed the man was going to devour the carcase, he replied in the affirmative, and added, very indifferently, that he was poor. Many of the beggars are really miserable beings. The provision made for them by the authorities, is to assign to them their districts, and oblige each shop-keeper to give something to each beggar that calls. I have often seen them half naked, lying by the side of the street, crying piteously, when it was cold enough to freeze water.

29th, Sabbath.—Our usual exercises in the forenoon. In the afternoon went out and called at a house where I had called before. They gave me the best seat in the house. It was a short bench, about six inches wide. They also showed the kindness of their feelings by the offer of a pipe. As I was communicating the elements of the Christian doctrine, one after another, in passing, would come in and sit down and listen respectfully. I think they understood my statements, but the doctrine they cannot be supposed fully to understand at first. I gave them an outline of the six days work of creation, the institution of the Sabbath, marriage, the depravity of all men, the holiness of God, the intervention of his mercy in sending his Son, the doctrine of the resurrection, and rewards and punishments according to the deeds done in the body. They gave better attention than I could expect such a stammering speaker to secure. In my present ignorance of the language, I think the manner has quite as much to do in impressing their minds as the matter. I find these exercises a benefit to myself, whether they are to others or not.

Feb. 11.—Had religious conversation with several to-day; gave a tract to one who could read. He was an active young husbandman. I told him I should want to know by-and-by, what he thought of it. Have not seen him since.

12th, Sabbath.—To-day Bro. W. and I went out about two miles west, called at two small hamlets, and were pleased to see how easy it was to obtain a hearing. We have only to commence conversation with any one we happen to see first, and soon men, women, and children, come round to see the strangers. They are not exceedingly shy nor obtrusive, and generally they listen with more attention than I was prepared to expect.

Feb. 15th.—Within the last three days the weather has moderated very much. This morning the thermometer at sunrise was at 56°, instead of 32 or below, as it has been for a considerable part of the winter. We omitted kindling fire until evening. We have had no snow worth mentioning. But they say this has been an unusually mild winter.

19th, Sabbath.—To-day took Too Quay and went out west to two hamlets. At one we came in contact with a school-teacher, who treated us with politeness, asked for a tract, which I immediately furnished, informing him that I would like to see him again. His manner was very frank and open. Entertaining some hope of future acquaintance, and unwilling to expose my ignorance too far, I left him, and called at another hamlet consisting of some half a dozen houses surrounded by one fence. Here we were soon surrounded by twenty or more, to whom I spoke the word of life as well as I could. Previously to my commencing religious conversation, they invited me to a seat outside of one of the houses. The houses are arranged in a circle, with a space common to them all in the middle.

This evening, being the middle of the first month, is famous as the season for making a display of lanterns and other fire-works. Went to the Ching-Wong-Meau, which is the greatest place for amusement in the city, where we saw many thousands assembled to witness the display of fire-works. I believe Bro. W. has given you some description of what we witnessed. Some day when I can find myself prepared for the task, I may attempt to give you some description of this same Ching-Wong-Meau. I have neither time nor ability to do it now.

SAD STATE OF THINGS.—A correspondent of one of the New York papers, writing from Providence, R. I., says:—

"The Sabbath has been repeatedly desecrated by steamboat excursions, in which hundreds of our inhabitants have participated."

He gives what he regards as the reason of this unhappy state of things thus:—

"This is the first year since its formation, that the 'Rhode Island Sabbath Union,' has omitted to hold a public meeting in Providence. This is exceedingly to be regretted; for who can doubt, that if, in the early part of the season, a kind Christian remonstrance had emanated from an annual meeting of this Association, at whose head stands his Excellency the Governor of the State, whose officers and members include some of our most respectable and influential citizens, and whose labors in former years have been attended with such beneficial results,—the prevention of much sin would have been effected, if not indeed, a complete stop been put to this great [illegible] growing evil."

Who can wonder that the "Sabbath" is desecrated in Providence, after learning that the Rhode Island Sabbath Union has not held a meeting there this year! And who can doubt that such desecration would have been prevented by a remonstrance from an Association which is supported by his Excellency the Governor, and some of the most respectable and influential citizens! What would become of society if these conservators of all good should happen to die, or even to grow weary in well-doing! Alas for the Sabbath, when religious men regard Governors and influential citizens as its main supporters.

CURTAILING EXPENSES.—The Missionary Herald says that in consequence of the heavy debt of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the Madura mission have been called upon to curtail their expenses. This has obliged them to dismiss a large number of the pupils in the free schools. The Rev. Mr. Muzzy, of that mission, under date of April 8th, writes: 'Four or five hundred scholars, who have been learning to read the Scriptures, and committing to memory Scriptural catechisms, and who heard the gospel preached on the Sabbath and other days, are now deprived of these privileges, and are under heathen influences entirely.'

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE for September came to hand before the English edition was near our shores. It contains "A Review of the last Session," "To a Caged Skylark," "Life in the Far West," "Life and Times of George II.," "The Great Tragedian," "The Moscow Retreat," "What would Revolutionizing Germany do?" ## SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Acadia arrived at Boston on Sunday last, bringing Liverpool papers to the 9th inst.

The weather in England had been extremely fine for a week, causing a material reduction in the price of breadstuffs.

The steamship United States, the non-arrival of which has created considerable anxiety in this country, left Cowes on the 3d inst., with 80 passengers, and a large cargo of French goods; but her machinery becoming damaged, she was obliged to put back to Southampton, where she will remain four or five weeks for repairs.

The two houses of Parliament were prorogued on the 5th inst., by a speech from the Queen in person.

Ireland is tranquil. Lord John Russel has been on a visit to the Earl of Clarendon, and his visit furnishes a theme for much speculation among Irish politicians.

In France, there is some commotion yet, occasioned by the attempt of Government to restrict the press, and the opposition of the National Guard to Cavaignac's administration. Much disturbance prevails in the departments.

Austria, it is said, has accepted the offered mediation of France and England, and a termination of hostilities is looked for.

The accounts from Italy and Rome declare the whole country to be in a distracted and excited state. At Genoa, Leghorn, and Rome tumults had occurred that were with difficulty suppressed.

There has been a severe conflict at Parma. The National Savoisien of the 4th inst., publishes a letter from Turin of the 2d inst., which states that the Austrians, having imposed an extraordinary contribution of 400,000 florins (£32-000) on the city of Parma, to be paid within four hours, that sum being not forthcoming within the poriod stated, the Croats, according to custom, commenced pillaging the city. The inhabitants, however, encouraged by the patriotic defence of Bologne, rung the tocsin, and commenced a fearful battle, in which they were assisted by the women and children. They threw their furniture from the windows upon the heads of the Austrians, and the inhabitants of the country hurried to their assistance, armed with their implements of husbandry. The result of the struggle had not been ascertained.

PROTESTANT MOVEMENT IN FRANCE.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser, says that a national synod of the Protestant Churches was to have been held in Paris on the 9th of September, for the purpose of bringing about a combined re-organization of the various churches. "This will be an exceedingly interesting meeting, as it is the first that has taken place since the revocation of the edict of Nantes; the last one was held in 1657, at London. Since the time of the revolution the principal synods or consistories have been allowed to meet, but though every effort was made, the Government constantly refused to allow meetings of a national synod. The revolution of February removed the restriction, and accordingly a preparatory meeting was held in Paris in May last, to arrange the basis for the election of delegates to the proposed assembly. These delegates are to be chosen by the provincial synods, one half to be clergymen and the others laymen; the synod will contain ninety-four members, two of whom are appointed by the theological faculty of Strasburg Montauban. Its deliberations will without doubt be of great importance, and will make a new era in the cause of Protestantism in France.

☞ We copy the following from the Golden Rule, for the benefit of those newspaper correspondents who wonder that their communications cannot always be published the first week after they are sent to the editor.

"POT HOOKS AND TRAMMELS.—What penmanship! Who ever saw the like? Shockingly mangled! Call this legible! It would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer to decipher it. Friend, did you intend this article for publication? When? In the year '48? You must give us more time. Our compositor has patience, great patience, but he ought not, cannot, will not rack his brains to untangle this brush heap. And as for ourself, such is the rush of duty, time will not permit us to dig up, and patch up, write and re-write; we had rather compose ten articles than re-model one. True, to gratify a dear friend, we have often spent whole hours to bring hidden things to light, meanwhile perspiration literally poured! It is the hardest work we ever did; we had rather labor at the oar, or dig in a quarry. We have now lying by us several communications of this stamp, valuable indeed, so far as we can judge, from the few scattering legible ideas, but beyond these, all is mystery, obscurity, and darkness! Correspondents, dear, mend your ways, do."

REVOLUTIONIZING IRELAND.—The best plan of revolutionizing Ireland, would be to send out one hundred young Irishmen who had been well educated in America, and understand our institutions, to establish free schools throughout that country. In five years these schools would accomplish more for Ireland, than the revolutionary attempts of the last fifty years. To support three hundred teachers would require an outlay of eighty thusand dollars a year, and upon the system of our New York Public Schools, each teacher could take charge of two hundred scholars, making twenty thousand scholars for the whole. This sum could readily be obtained among the friends of Ireland in America. The teachers should be good orators, thoroughly educated, and hearty co-workers in the great objects of their mission. ## SUMMARY.

The Niagara Chronicle of the 14th, says it understands that the project of constructing a suspension bridge across the Niagara at Queenston is again revived, and this time with every prospect of being carried out. Mr. Ellet, the engineer of the bridge at the Falls, undertakes to construct it for £10,000, and will himself take one-fourth of the stock. This leaves £7,500 to be subscribed for, half of which has been already taken up on the American side, and a large portion of the other half on the Canada side of the river. If no unforseen difficulties arise, the Bridge will be ready for use by September of next year.

The Halifax Recorder says, some years have elapsed since the take of mackerel has been so extensive as within the past fortnight. Notwithstanding the blow on Friday night, some hundreds of barrels were stopped between Fresh Water Bridge and the "Black Rock;" we believe a similar occurrence is not on record. In fact, the whole harbor, particularly Bedford Basin, is literally swarming with mackerel.

An extensive and important Sale of Land, situated in Illinois and Wisconsin, will take place by auction at the Exchange, in Philadelphia, on the evening of the 3d of October. It is said, on the authority of a Mexican gentlemen of good intelligence and liberality, that there does not exist in the whole of Mexico, at this time, a single unpaid debt contracted by any of the officers of our regular army. A school house at Reading, Mass., was struck by lightning on Friday afternoon, 1st inst., and a little girl among the scholars prostrated, in a room filled with smoke and sulphur. The teacher carried her to the door for dead, but some neighbors poured water over her freely, and she revived. Her body bears the marks of the lightning from the shoulder down the breast, and one of the legs. A physician said that the water saved her. Two other buildings were struck, and a horse killed.

The whole of the quarrel arose from a fondness for gambling and drinking.

A man traveling eastward on the Utica Railroad, the other day, who refused to pay his fare, was ejected from the cars by the collector at Oriskany. Dr. Thomas Barbour, of St. Louis, in the St. Louis Republican of the 14th, describes a case of what he believes to have been true Asiatic cholera, which came under his care on the 11th. The patient was Mr. H. H. Palmer, an organ builder, who had had the disease before in London. The symptoms, as discribed by Dr. Barbour, are exactly those of cholera, and the fatal termination was rapid, Mr. Palmer dying within forty-eight hours.

One of the most singular curiosities exhibited at the recent State Fair in Buffalo, was a buck's head and horns completely grown over with oak. The whole was taken from the side of a tree, in one of the interior counties of Michigan, and was presented as a natural curiosity. The question naturally arises, how came the head in the tree?—and how long a time has it required to become so thoroughly imbedded?

While several laborers were at work digging a vault in Cincinnati, they struck upon something which is calculated to excite the speculative fancy of antiquaries. At the depth of thirteen feet from the surface, in the primeval forest, and through lime-stone rock and tough soil, a knife and an iron chain were found—both much corroded.

THE DYING GIRL TO HER SISTER.

The dream is o'er! I'm dying now,
There is a dampness on my brow;
The pang is o'er; without a sigh
I'll pass away and sweetly die.
But, oh! that pang cost many a tear!
'Twas hard to yield up friends so dear,
But that is passed—I'll weep no more,
With me the dream of life is o'er.
And now, sweet sister, nearer come,
And tell me of that happy home;
Shall I its pearly gates behold,
Its streets all paved with burnished gold?
And in that clime so strangely fair,
Say, shall I feel a stranger there?
Or will their harp strings sweetly blend,
To welcome me, a child and friend?
But softly, sister, softly speak,
And say—these tears upon thy cheek!
Weep not for me—oh, do not pine!
I would not wake to earth again.
The hand—so often clasped of old—
The soft warm hand, for mine grown cold;
And now, dear sister, let me rest
My wearied head upon thy breast,
And fold thy arms about my form;
It shivers 'neath death's dark, cold storm,
But sing me, sister, ere I go,
Our song—our childhood's song, you know,
And let its gentle numbers flow,
As last you sung; soft, sweet and low—
And when its last faint echoes die,
And the bright tears steal from thine eye—
I shall not heed them as they stray,
I shall be gone—far, far away!

INSTINCT OF ANIMALS.

While in Washington last winter, a very observing man, and quite a naturalist, as observing men are apt to be, told us some stories about the sagacity and intelligence he had witnessed in different animals, which were wonderful enough, and which we think well worth transferring to our cabinet of curiosities. So the gentleman kindly furnished two or three of these stories for this purpose, and here they are:

Six or eight years ago, in the city of Washington, I was passing the mouth of an alley leading into a vacant lot, when my attention was drawn to a group of very young children laughing vociferously. I entered the alley to see the cause of their mirth, and soon ascertained it to be a large white goose, with a strip of narrow tin bent into a hoop, and thrown over the head of the fowl, by one of the urchins. The poor goose seemed much annoyed by the shining necklace, and ran about in every direction trying to shake it off. I found that it was the sight of these antics which had so much amused the little ragged juveniles. I stopped to see if the goose would unyoke herself; and while watching her, I observed some ducks in another part of the yard; and very soon a drake from among them made a great quacking, and started off toward the embarrassed goose. When near, the latter stretched her neck out horizontally, and to my very great astonishment and admiration, the drake seized the lower part of the tin collar in his beak, the goose withdrew her head from it, and the drake immediately dropped it upon the ground; when the air rang with the plaudits of the children and the gabbling of the fowls.

In the summer of 1844, I witnessed an exhibition of intelligence in a low order of the insect tribe, still more remarkable. I went from Washington city on an excursion by water, to the mouth of the Patuxent, for recreation, and in quest of geological specimens for my cabinet. One morning while on the beach, quite within the mouth of the river, waiting for some comrades to join me, I observed a large grey spider at the water's edge, and expected to see some of the tiny ripples overtake and drown him. He was tumbled over several times, as the sailor says, "upon his beam ends," but soon recovered, and did not seem to mind it. While watching his movements, a brilliant blue wasp flew upon the spider's back, and stung him, and a battle ensued. I was deeply interested in the affair, and closely observed the two combatants. After flying up and pouncing down again upon the spider several times, the latter seemed quite used up, and was floating off a foot or two from the margin of the water, by the miniature seas, upon his back, and his feet all drawn up. The wasp alighted upon him, took a foot in his mouth, and by the aid of his wings, towed him ashore. He then alighted upon the sand, seized a leg of the spider in his mouth, and walking backward, dragged him some distance ashore. He continued to drag the spider in this way, and resting occasionally, till he arrived at a ridge in the sand, of about an inch in perpendicular height, and parallel to the water for a great distance. This ridge was caused by the washing of the flood tide. It was then low water. As the spider was at least four times the bulk and weight of the wasp, he found this ridge an insurmountable obstacle. He flew to the top, stooped over, and endeavored to lift the spider bodily up, but in vain. He then flew some yards lower down, and then above where the spider lay, all the time reconnoitering to find a breach in the embankment, or an ascent by which to get his prey up. Noticing his perplexity, I cautiously laid a little piece of bark as an inclined plain, near the spider, which was soon observed by the wasp, when he at once dragged the spider up the plain and landed him safely on the opposite side of the ridge. Again he resumed his toilsome dragging, still at right angles to the water's edge, toiling and resting alternately, till he had drawn his victim some eighteen or twenty feet from the water, near the foot of a very high cliff. There he flew about, as if at a loss how to proceed further. I approached, and saw him enter a hole in the sand, and back out again, and so enter several of these holes. Sometimes he would only go in half his length, and rarely deep enough to disappear altogether. Then he would back out again. By and by he alighted on the spider, and carried him past several holes, leaving him at the mouth of another, which he inspected by getting half in. But again he came out, and took the spider to the next hole, which he also inspected, came out, seized the spider by the leg in his mouth, and entered the hole backward, dragging the spider after him.

I sat down near the abode of this bold, persevering, and sagacious insect, and felt more gratification from the past half-hour's entertainment, than ever I had experienced from a trifling incident before, and fell into a revery—musing on the extraordinary works of nature—till roused by my comrades. ## A CHINESE CITY.

As there is no part of the world so densely populated as China, so there is no part of the empire so densely populated as Canton. The streets are exceedingly narrow, and in many places hardly sufficient to allow the crowded population to pass. There are no wheel carriages in use. The passenger walking through the town is constantly jostled by the chair-bearers of the mandarins, or wealthy merchants. Recovered from such a shock, a coolee, or porter, bearing a burden, knocks him against the wall with a sort of grunt, while he is shuffled in an opposite direction by a second. Peculiarly curious to English eyes are the number and variety of the live stock which are exposed for sale in these narrow streets—puppy dogs yelping in bamboo cages, kittens mewing, rats squeaking, fowls chucking, ducks quacking, geese cackling, and pigs granting. Fish swimming, and earth-worms, slugs, &c. &., variously disposed, are exhibited in tubs and earthen pans. A barber close by twangs his iron tweezers to call his customers near him; another operates upon a patient customer, seated on a tripod stand—plaiting his tail, cleaning his ears, shaving his head and face, extracting all long and superfluous hair from his eyelashes, eyebrows, and nose, and finishing off by a good thumping of his back, and cracking his joints. Hard by is an itinerant vender of cooked food, with an enormous reed umbrella, dispensing rice, fat pork, and stews, swimming in oil and soy, which he serves out in small bowls and basins to his hungry customers, who devour the mess with an epicure's gout. Beside this merchant is seated a brother itinerant, the vender of sweetmeats. A little further on stands a bookseller, exposing his library, the contents of two boxes, which he hawks about. In his vicinity is a fortune-teller in the act of unfolding the future to an anxious dupe, and a doctor decorated with a string of human teeth around his neck, extending below his waist, while his box of drugs hangs before him. Then an aged woman may be seen, with feet three inches long, seated under an umbrella, mending old clothes, while a passer-by wanting a button sewed on, repairs to her, and remunerates her with a 'cash.' Not far distant a leprous beggar exhibits his disgusting sores, and rattles two pieces of bamboo to attract attention. Suppose the air filled with the noises, cries, and vociferations of these various venders, and of the constantly-changing throng of human beings, and some slight conception may be formed of Canton on approaching to Hog-lane. Going through this thoroughfare, which is occupied by spirit shops, and stores of all kinds, announcements such as the following arrest the eye:—'Ingli is ere spok;' 'Jack, all ting ere fin will;' with others of a similar orthography. This street is frequented by sailors, and being the resort of the very lowest and most depraved, Jack often gets robbed, and becoming rusty, uses his fists, when a general scrimmage takes place. ## CONFESS YOUR FAULTS.

"Oh, I am so afraid we shall be found out?" said Emma Clifford, to a companion, as she threw herself into an easy chair.

These little girls, about a week before, had taken the time which should have been spent at school, to run and play in the woods which were not far from where they lived. A party of truant boys from another school joined them, and picked flowers and dug mosses for them, but none of them were happy, for they knew they were doing wrong. About the usual time for school to be out, Emma and her companion returned home. Their parents said nothing to them about school, as they did not dream they had been doing wrong, although they did not appear as cheerful as usual.

"Are you sick, my dear?" said the mother of Emma, drawing her little daughter to her side.

"Yes, mother, I am not well; my head aches severely;" and she trembled as she spoke, for she knew she was uttering a falsehood.

"You had better retire, Emma," said her mother, "and I will get something for your head."

But Emma's conscience still troubled her. In the morning she went to school as usual; her teacher met her with a smile, and kindly asked her why she was absent from school the day before.

"I was not well," said Emma, and she quickly turned away to hide her tears.

"I am sorry," replied her teacher; "if I had known it, I should certainly have been in to see you."

But before she had half finished, Emma had gone into another room. Miss Stanley thought she appeared strangely, but Emma was one of her favorite scholars, and she could not think she had done wrong. In her classes, Emma made many mistakes, and Miss Stanley observing it, told her she feared she was ill, and that she might be excused from the remainder of her classes. After a few days, Emma made the remark above mentioned, "Oh, I am afraid we will be found out! and what would Miss Stanley think of me, and what would my parents say? Miss Stanley is so kind, and smiles so sweetly! Oh, how differently would she treat me, if she knew how wicked I had been!"

Emma's load continued to become greater, until one evening, about a month after the day she played truant, she entered the parlor, and throwing herself into her mother's arms, confessed her sin with many tears. She found the greatest task was to confess to her teacher; but she did confess, and never after played truant or told a lie to conceal a fault.

DEAF-MUTES.

It is probably known to our readers, that M. Dubois of Paris, whose son had the misfortune to be totally deaf from his birth, had some years ago succeeded in teaching him not only to speak correctly but to understand the speech of others, not a lisp of which he could hear, when articulated distinctly. He in fact reads the language on the lips of the speaker, and replies intelligibly to the ears. He has become a teacher of those under a similar deprivation. Two years ago the Minister of the Interior entrusted to him two deaf mutes, taken at random from the departments, for instruction on his plan. The Editor of the Democratic Pacifique, in his paper of August 23d, thus speaks of the result:—

"The greater part of these children actually speak in a loud and intelligible voice, and write to dictation; they understand the oral questions which are put to them, and reply with propriety; and it is remarkable that their proficiency in writing and orthography is more advanced than that of children who frequent our country primary schools generally is."

The advantages of this system of instruction for the deaf are obvious and important. It opens to them at once the whole field of life; communication by the digital alphabet and by mimicry must always be confined to the initiated. From the public at large the educated deaf-mute is still excluded. He can only correspond with them by a written language, a process so laborious and tedious as to exclude him from the professions and from ordinary business intercourse. A deaf person, educated to speak and read the lips on the plan of M. Dubois, is at once eligible to any employment for which he possesses the mental qualifications. He would not make a good music teacher, we dare say, but he would do for a lawyer or divine, quite well for a doctor, and excellently for a merchant. [Chronotype.

A PRAIRIE PLOUGH.

A correspondent of the Albany Atlas, in a recent communication, gives the following account of a "Prairie Plough":

"In an afternoon excursion I first saw a 'break-up plough,' in full blast. Five yoke of oxen were drawing the huge thing, which certainly looked something like a plough, but to be put to the plough of the Eastern world it was a mastodon to a mouse! The cast mould-board was, say an inch thick, the rough share of the thickness of a bar of iron, and the other parts in proportion. The coulter, strong enough to sever roots, or grubs as they are called in western parlance, had a sort of foot to it, running on the same level with the bottom of the plough, and into the rear part of this the point of the ploughshare was inserted to strengthen and stiffen the whole machine. They were breaking up the soil of an ungirdled forest, filled in some places with coppices of young oaks and hickories from six to ten feet high. On went the team, crashing through roots of the size of a man's arm, turning down the little trees, and laying over in a very workmanlike way, all things considered, a furrow-slice twenty inches wide and seven inches deep. Occasionally a mightier grub would arrest the career of the cattle for a moment, but the boys driving would yell and ply their whips, the cattle would spring forward, and the grub would come up with a 'rip,' or break off. The roots brought to the surface by the plough and drag, and the young trees, are gathered in piles and burnt. Behind the ploughman stalked a matronly hen, and a whole flock of blackbirds, their bright yellow eyes and glossy necks glancing in the sun. They were picking up the worms and bugs exposed by the plough. The blackbirds are always in the suite of the break-up plough, and come from the marshes to follow it, as soon as they discover it going into the field. After the land is once "subdued," ploughing is another affair in Michigan. The soil is as mellow as an ash heap, and a light plough, like the stubble-plough of the East, is then used."

ANECDOTE OF JOHN JACOB ASTOR.

"Do you ever trust, Mr. Astor," inquired Mr. K.

"I do not trust strangers, sir," was the reply, "unless they furnish satisfactory city reference."

"Then," quoth Mr. K., "the skins I have selected must suffice for this time," and paying for the same he departed.

In the afternoon of the same day, just before the sailing of the New Bedford packet, the young trader returned for his lot of furs. Throwing the whole pack on his back, he left the store, but had not proceeded a dozen yards from the store, when Mr. A. called his name, bidding him come back.

"Sir," said Mr. A., "you can have credit for any amount of goods you require, provided they are to be found in my store."

"But," stammered Mr. K., "but—my dear sir, I can give you no city references; I am a stranger here."

"I ask no other recommendation," responded the rich merchant, "than that already furnished by yourself. The man who is not above his business need never hesitate to apply to John Jacob Astor for credit."

Thus commenced a trade between two merchants, which was continued to the mutual satisfaction and advantage of both for a long term of years. Mr. K. is now one of the most eminent capitalists in New Bedford. [Ex. Paper.

INTEMPERANCE.—A friend of mine, says Dr. Nott, once gave me the number and the names of a social club of temperate drinkers which once existed in Schenectady, and of which, when young, he himself was a member; and I have remarked how bereft of fortune, how bereft of reputation, bereft of health, and sometimes even bereft of reason, they have descended, one after another, prematurely to the grave; until, at length, though not an old man, that friend alone remains of all the number, to tell how he was rescued from a fate so terrible, by the timely and prophetic counsel of a pious mother. And I have remarked, too, how those pupils of my own, who in despite of warning, and admonition, and entreaty, persisted in the use of intoxicating liquors while at college, have, on entering the world, sunk into obscurity, and finally disappeared from among those rival actors, once their companions, rising into life; and when, searching out the cause, I have full of anxiety, inquired after one, and another, and another, the same answer has been returned, "He has become, or gone a sot into the grave."

ELECTRICITY.—The great lightning storm of 19th of June, which extended 700 miles in length, presented at Trenton, N. J., some facts that are deserving of particular record. The extensive iron works at that place, belonging to Peter Cooper, Esq., New York, became charged with electric energies from the storm. The damper connected with iron chains, was attempted to be lowered during the storm. The first person that laid hold of the chain was knocked down; a second made the attempt and shared the same fate, and a third received a severe shock. A fireman stirring the melted iron in the furnace, received a severe shock when he touched the molten metal with his iron stirrer. A tin dripping pan under the bellows was bruised as if a 56 lb. weight had fallen in its centre from a great height. There were in the works at the time between two and three hundred men, and about 2000 tons of iron, some in a state of fusion, some in a heated state, and the residue cold.

INTRODUCTION TO A PHILOSOPHER.—I must relate the circumstances of my first introduction to the learned Professor Cramer, since they were truly original. He had a country house in the suburbs; and when I called to pay my respects, I was told I should find him in his garden. I heard the sound of laughter and merry voices as I approached, and saw an elderly gentleman bent forwards in the middle of the walk, while several boys were playing leap-frog over him. A lady who stood by him said, as soon as she perceived me, "Cramer, Steffens is there." "Well, (he said, without moving,) leap then." I was delighted with the new mode of introduction to men of science, took my leap clean over him, and then turned round to make my bow and compliments. He was delighted; and as my good leap also won the hearts of the young people, I was at once admitted as an acquaintance in the happy circle. Notwithstanding this quaint reception, Cramer was a man of deep reflection, with all the quiet manner of a true philosopher.

LONDON.—According to the Rev. Mr. Bellows, the sale of the public parks of London, would probably pay off the national debt. 'The first and last characteristic of London,' he writes, 'the peculiarity which thrusts itself upon you every moment, is it size! Of this no description gives you any adequate idea. To say that it is thirty miles round, or that one may ride seven or eight miles across the town without getting out of the uninterrupted rows of houses; to say that it is ten times as large as New York, and has a hundred streets half as long and as well built as Broadway; to say that it includes parks, in which the whole city of Boston, or all New York below Bleecker st., might be enclosed, may help one to form a notion of its magnitude.'

CHINESE METHOD OF MAKING SHEET LEAD.—The method of making sheet-lead employed by the Chinese, is carried on by two men. One is seated on the floor, with a large flat stone before him, and with a moveable flat stone-stand at his side. His fellow workman stands beside him with a crucible filled with melted lead, and having poured a certain quantity upon the stone, the other lifts the moveable stone, and, dashing it on the fluid lead, presses it out into a flat and thin plate, which he instantly removes from the stone. A second quantity of lead is poured in a similar manner, and a similar plate formed, the process being carried on with singular rapidity. The rough edges of the plates are then cut off, and they are soldered together for use.

THIMBLE-MAKING.—In the thimble manufacture the bar of silver is welded into a long ribbon, which is cut into small pieces, each piece to make the barrel of a thimble. The top is cut out of another strip of iron or silver. The rim is hammered around a bar of iron and soldered, and after the top is soldered in, the whole thimble is placed on a turning lathe and chiseled inside and outside—it is then marked with the needle holes, by a little roller pressed against it, and finally polished and ornamented by various instruments. We have omitted several of the processes through which it passes. Altogether, there cannot be less than twenty, and after all the thimble is sold at a very small advance on the weight of the silver.

MRS. FRY'S RULES.—First, never lose any time; I do not think that lost which is spent in amusement or recreation, some time every day; but always be in the habit of being employed. Second, never err the least in truth. Third, never say an ill thing of any person, when I can say a good thing of them; not only to speak charitably, but feel so. Fourth, never be irritable or unkind to any body. Fifth, never indulge in luxuries that are not necessary. Sixth, do all things with consideration, and when my path to act right is more difficult, feel confidence in that Power alone which is able to assist me, and exert my own powers as far as they go.

THE GREAT BURMAN BELL.—Next to the great bell of Moscow, which weighs 444,000 lbs., is the bell of Mengoon, mentioned by Mr. Malcom, who describes the Burmese as very famous for casting bells. Their bells are, however, disproportionately thick, but of delightful tone. The raised inscriptions and figures are as beautiful as any bells in the world. They do not flare open like a trumpet, but are precisely the shape of old globular wine glasses, or semi-spheroidical. There are several in the Empire of enormous size. That at Mengoon, near Ava, weighs about 444,000 lbs. It is suspended a few inches from the ground, and like other great bells is without a tongue.

THREE FAULTS OF NURSES.—1. To lisp in a baby style, when the same words in an endearing tone would please as well. The reverse should be the practice; the voice clearly emphatic, and each syllable distinctly articulated for imitation. 2. To tell of witches, ghosts, and goblins. 3. To direct a child to act a man; whereas it is not often becoming for a little boy to ape the man, but only to conform his demeanor to his age. Every age has its peculiar decorousness.

AFFECTED HUMILITY AND REAL PRIDE.—Thomas à Becket, who was afterwards primate of England, was a strange compound of affected humility and real pride. While he performed the lowly office of washing the feet of thirteen beggars every morning, his supercilious, obstinate, and turbulent spirit assumed a proud, overbearing, spiritual authority over his sovereign, whom he was in the habit of treating with all the insolence of a licensed censor.

The famine in Newfoundland is disappearing before the abundant harvests and productive fisheries. The Labrador fisheries have been very successful.

Hon. Horace Mann, of Mass., has written a letter, declining to take sides for either candidate for the presidency. He also states that he will not be a candidate for reelection.

Simon Willard, "The Massachusetts Clock-maker," died in Boston on the 30th ult., aged 95 years and 5 months.

Mr. Warder Cresson, U. S. Consul at Jerusalem, and the Rabbi Bucklore Cohen, of the same city, arrived at Boston on Monday.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

BOARD OF INSTRTCTION.

W. C. KENYON, A. M., } Principals.
IRA SAYLES, A. M., }

Assisted by nine able and experienced Teachers, five in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past ten years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to also continue to merit a share of public patronage

Extensive buildings are now erected for the accommodation of students, and for Recitation and Lecture Rooms, &c. They occupy an eligible position, and are finished in the best style of modern architecture; and the different apartments are heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical

Ladies and Gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board and rooms can also be had in private families, if particularly desired.

Each room for those who board in the Hall is furnished with a bed and bedding, a table, two chairs, and a pail.

The plan of instruction adopted in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the student, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The Health, the Manners, and the Morals of our Students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

REGULATIONS.

1. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.
2. Punctuality in attending all regular Academic exercises will be required.
3. The use of Tobacco, for chewing or smoking, will not be allowed either in or about the Academic buildings.
4. Playing at games of chance cannot be allowed.
5. Using profane language cannot be allowed.
6. The use of any kind of intoxicating drinks cannot be allowed, unless prescribed in case of sickness, by a regular physician.
7. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, cannot be permitted.
8. Gentlemen and ladies of the Institution will not be permitted to visit the rooms of the opposite sex, except in cases of imperious necessity, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.
9. Good order must be maintained at all times, and in all the rooms and halls of the Institution, and in all the intercourse of students with each other.
10. All students are required to retire regularly at the ringing of the bell designated for that purpose, as occasion may require; and to rise at the ringing of the morning bell, also designated.
11. Any room, occupied by students, will, at all times, be subject to the visitation of the Teachers of the Institution, who are required to see that the regulations are complied with.
12. Students will be required to keep their own rooms in good order, and to pay all unnecessary damages, either of rooms or of furniture furnished with the rooms.

REGULAR ACADEMIC EXERCISES.

The regular exercises, at which all the students will be required to attend, unless specially excused, are, Chapel exercises each morning during the term; Recitations, from two to four, five days each week, from Monday morning till Friday evening. Compositions and Declamations, one-half day, once in two weeks, Literary, Scientific, and Moral Lectures by the Principals. Public Worship, once in each week, either on Saturday or Sunday, according as the students may be in the habit of keeping the Sabbath, either on the seventh or first day of the week.

GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the students will be in the hands of the Principals, and will be strictly and steadily exercised, and at the same time, strictly parental. The object of our academic government being to secure the greatest possible amount of physical, intellectual, and moral good to the students themselves, regularity and order of exercises, and good and wholesome citizens to society. No unwarrantable means will be made use of to enforce the observance of the above regulations; yet our constant endeavor will be, to make the means resorted to as effective as humun means may be.

Parents who place their children in this Institution, and all students who are sufficiently old to understand the necessity of order, cannot be too well assured that the foregoing regulations form the most essential part of the contract between them and us; and that whatever student wantonly violates them, and shows himself incorrigibly determined on pursuing his waywardness, will be expelled from the privileges of the Institution, and will not be permitted to re-enter it again, without special proof of reformation. Nor will an expelled student have any deduction made from full term charges.

Farther, parents are requested not to place money for expenses, in the hands of students who are not old enough to use money with discretion and economy. Either of the Principals, or the Book-keeper of the Institution, will act as fiscal guardian of such students without charge.

ADMISSION.

Candidates for admission as students, must present testimonials of good moral character, or be known to possess such a character, and must be willing to comply unreservedly with the foregoing regulations; and no one will be permitted to receive instructions in any class, until all academic bills, for the term in prospect, be paid or satisfactorily arranged.

ACADEMIC TERMS.

The Academic Year for 1848–9 consists of three terms, as follows:

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1848, and ending Thursday, November 23, 1848.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, December 5, 1848, and ending Thursday, March 15, 1849.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, April 3, 1849, and ending July 12, 1849.

As the plan of instruction in this Institution, laid out for each class, will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue through the term, and accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the terms.

N. B. Students who are expecting to teach during the winter or summer, will specify such intention on entering in the beginning of the fall or spring term; and, for the special accommodation of such, a day will be set apart at first, on which they can leave, if they wish; and they will not be permitted to leave on any other day, nor will any other than teachers be permitted to leave on the day specified.

Farther, it is of the utmost importance that the student be present at the day of the opening of the term, as on that and the succeeding day, the students entering are examined and classified.

It is also suggested to parents who patronize this Institution from the distance of a few miles around, that students should go home only once during the term, as every absence from classes is always attended with disadvantages to the student. This is a suggestion, and not imperative. But to meet this suggestion, the exercise of the school will close at noon on the seventh Friday in each term, and open again on the afternoon of Monday following.

EXPENSES.

JAMES A. BEGG ON THE SABBATH.

SECTION VIII.

Observance of the Sabbath by the Jews and Israelites after the promulgation of the Law at Sinai till the incarnation of Christ.

Before advancing to the consideration of New Testament texts, it is desirable to notice the state in which the question is left by the Old Testament writers. In seeking to trace the history of Sabbath observance, we are early brought to a consideration of man's dark rebellion against the God by whom he hath been redeemed. Notwithstanding the grace displayed towards Israel in giving to them renewed knowledge of His holy will, and in making provision for their more perfect sanctification of the Sabbath, we find that they often, nationally as well as individually, rejected the counsel of the Lord against themselves. While they were yet in the wilderness, we find the instance of a man who sinned presumptuously in this respect, by gathering sticks upon the Sabbath day, and who was punished capitally for the offence. Num. 15: 32—36. And in afterwards recounting their transgressions, through the mouth of the prophet Ezekiel, Jehovah thus complains:

"In the day when I chose Israel, and lifted up mine hand unto the seed of the house of Jacob, and made myself known unto them in the land of Egypt, when I lifted up mine hand unto them, saying, I am the Lord your God; in the day that I lifted up mine hand unto them to bring them forth of the land of Egypt, into a land that I had espied for them, flowing with milk and honey, which is the glory of all lands; then said I unto them, Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes, and defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt; I am the Lord your God. But they rebelled against me, and would not hearken unto me; they did not every man cast away the abominations of their eyes, neither did they forsake the idols of Egypt; then I said, I will pour out my fury upon them, to accomplish my anger against them, in the midst of the land of Egypt. But I wrought for my name's sake, that it should not be polluted before the heathen, among whom they were, in whose sight I made myself known unto them, in bringing them forth out of the land of Egypt. Wherefore I caused them to go forth out of the land of Egypt, and brought them into the wilderness. And I gave them my statutes and shewed them my judgments, which if a man do, he shall even live in them. Moreover, also, I gave them my Sabbaths, to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them. But the house of Israel rebelled against me in the wilderness; they walked not in my statutes, and they despised my judgments, which if a man do, he shall even live in them; and my Sabbaths they greatly polluted; THEN I said I would pour out my fury upon them in the wilderness to consume them. But I wrought for my name's sake, that it should not be polluted before the heathen, in whose sight I brought them out. Yet also I lifted up mine hand unto them in the wilderness, that I would not bring them into the land which I had given them, flowing with milk and honey, which is the glory of all lands; because they despised my judgments, and walked not in my statutes, but polluted my Sabbaths; for their hearts went after their idols. Nevertheless mine eye spared them from destroying them, neither did I make an end of them in the wilderness. But I said unto their children in the wilderness, Walk ye not in the statutes of your fathers, neither observe their judgments, nor defile yourselves with their idols; I am the Lord your God; walk in my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them; and hallow my Sabbaths; and they shall be a sign between me and you, that ye may know that I am the Lord your God. Notwithstanding, the children rebelled against me; they walked not in my statutes, neither kept my judgments to do them, which if a man do he shall even live in them; they polluted my Sabbaths; then I said, I would pour out my fury upon them, to accomplish my anger against them in the wilderness. Nevertheless I withdrew my hand, and wrought for my name's sake, that it should not be polluted in the sight of the heathen, in whose sight I brought them forth. I lifted up mine hand unto them also in the wilderness, that I would scatter them among the heathen, and disperse them through the countries; because they had not executed my judgments, but had despised my statutes, and had polluted my Sabbaths, and their eyes were after their fathers' idols. Wherefore I gave them also statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live; and I polluted them in their own gifts, in that they caused to pass through the fire all that openeth the womb, that I might make them desolate, to the end that they might know that I am the Lord. Therefore, Son of man, speak unto the house of Israel, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, yet in this your fathers have blasphemed me, in that they have committed a trespass against me." Ezek. 20: 5—27.

We have cited thus at length the statements of the Lord as at once illustrating the early profanation of the Sabbath by the house of Israel, and the importance attached to its sanctification by the Lord of the Sabbath. The long suffering of Jehovah alone preserved His people from utter destruction, while yet He meted out to them judgments on account of their sin. The observance of the Sabbath, with the other statutes and commandments of the Lord, were designed as a means for promoting the sanctification of men; and liberal promises were from the first made to the Israelites if it should be religiously respected by them. Not only should Sabbath sanctification, and obedience to all the commands of the Lord, be the joy and peace of their hearts, but the fruitfulness of their land, with its safe and peaceful possession, victory over their enemies, and security against evil beasts, with abundance of bread, and their own fruitfulness, were promised as the reward of their fidelity, together with the establishing of God's tabernacle and His covenant with them; yea, that He should walk among them, and be their God. Lev. 26: 1—13.

But, in connection with these promises to its sanctification, we find in like manner that the profanation of this holy day occupies a prominent place among the reasons given by God through Moses for the judgments which in all ages have overtaken His people. And let it be remarked, it there stands prominent among the causes of God's displeasure as yet experienced in their present dispersion and oppression:—

"But if ye will not hearken unto me, and will not do all these commandments; and if ye shall despise my statutes, or if your soul abhor my judgments, so that ye will not do all my commandments, but that ye break my covenant; I also will do this unto you; I will even appoint over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of heart; and ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it. And I will set my face against you, and ye shall be slain before your enemies; they that hate you shall reign over you; and ye shall flee when none pursueth you.

"And if ye will not yet for all this hearken unto me, then I will punish you seven times more for your sins. And I will break the pride of your power; and I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass; and your strength shall be spent in vain; for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land yield their fruits. And if ye walk contrary unto me, and will not hearken unto me, I will bring seven times more plagues upon you, according to your sins. I will also send wild beasts among you, which will rob you of your children, and destroy your cattle, and make you few in number; and your highways shall be desolate.

"And if ye will not be reformed by me, by these things, but will walk contrary unto me; then will I also walk contrary unto you, and will punish you yet seven times for your sins. And I will bring a sword upon you, that shall avenge the quarrel of my covenant; and when ye are gathered together within your cities, I will send the pestilence among you; and ye shall be delivered into the hands of the enemy. And when I have broken the staff of your bread, ten women shall bake your bread in one oven, and they shall deliver you your bread again by weight; and ye shall eat, and not be satisfied.

"And if ye will not for all this hearken unto me, but walk contrary unto me; then I will walk contrary unto you also in fury; and I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins. And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters shall ye eat, and I will destroy your high places, and cut down your images, and cast your carcases upon the carcases of your idols, and my soul shall abhor you. And I will make your cities waste, and bring your sanctuaries unto desolation, and I will not smell the savour of your sweet odors. And I will bring the land into desolation; and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it, and I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you; and your land shall be desolate and your cities waste. Then shall the land enjoy her Sabbaths, as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemies' land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her Sabbaths. As long as it lieth desolate, it shall rest; because it did not rest in your Sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it.

"And upon them that are left alive of you, I will send a faintness into their hearts in the lands of their enemies; and the sound of a shaking leaf shall chase them; and they shall flee, as fleeing from a sword; and they shall fall when none pursueth. And they shall fall one upon another, as it were before a sword, when none pursueth, and ye shall have no power to stand before your enemies. And ye shall perish among the heathen, and the land of your enemies shall eat you up. And they that are left of you shall pine away in their iniquity in your enemies' lands; and also in the iniquities of their fathers shall they pine away with them.

"If they shall confess their iniquity, and the iniquity of their fathers, with their trespass which they trespassed against me, and that also they have walked contrary unto me; and that I also have walked contrary unto them, and have brought them into the land of their enemies; if then their uncircumcised hearts be humbled, and they then accept of the punishment of their iniquity; then will I remember my covenant with Jacob, and also my covenant with Isaac, and also my covenant with Abraham will I remember; and I will remember the land. The land also shall be left of them, and shall enjoy her Sabbaths, while she lieth desolate without them; and they shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity, because, even because they despised my judgments, and because their soul abhorred my statutes.

"And yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor them, to destroy them utterly, and to break my covenant with them; for I am the Lord their God. But I will for their sakes remember the covenant of their ancestors whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt in the sight of the heathen, that I might be their God; I am the Lord. These are the statutes and judgments and laws, which the Lord made between Him and the children of Israel in Mount Sinai by the hand of Moses." Lev. 26: 14—46.

The chapter is a prophecy; and there is in this sad prospective history of Israel's declension much that is instructive. The power and grace of God they had already witnessed in illustrious display for their deliverance. He had dealt with them as He had not dealt with any other nation; and they avouched him to be their only God. But how soon did they forget the Rock of their salvation! The prophecy, from which we have quoted, foretold deep and general alienation of heart, and predicted the consequences to which thereby they should be exposed. Yet the threatenings and promises of the Most High were forgotten, were unheeded, or despised, in the day both of their prosperity and of their adversity. [To be continued.

THE BLIND MOTHER.

Say, shall I never see thy face, my child?
My heart is full of feelings strange and wild;
A mother's hopes and heartfelt joys are mine,
My soul is filled with gushings half divine;
And never more, my child, am I alone,
Since thy young heart doth echo to my own.

But shall I never see thee? Can it be,
That all may gaze, my precious boy, on thee;
And yet the heart that loves thee best forego
The dearest pleasure other mothers know?
This—this is anguish—agony refined!
O God! forgive me! Baby, I am blind!

Yes, yes! I never—never knew before
The depth of my affliction. O for power
For one short thrilling moment, child, to gaze
On thy sweet, tiny face, which others praise!
And yet I must not murmur; God is kind;
But this is darkness! Now I feel I'm blind!

Nay, do not start, my child, it was a tear
That hit thy brow! Thy mother, boy, is here;
And though I may not see thee, yet I feel
Thy velvet cheek against my bosom steal,
And none can harm thee; nor hand unkind
Shall touch my darling, even though I'm blind.

List—list! It is thy father's step I hear;
Now let me smooth my brow, press back the tear;
He shall not find me weeping, when so blest,
With thee, my darling, cradled on my breast;
But could I only see thee! Yet God's will Be done! Peace, throbbing heart—be still!

We are alone again; he never guessed
What yearning anguish filled thy mother's breast,
When he did praise thy features, half defined—
He quite forgot that his young wife was blind;
And yet, when his fond arm was round us thrown,
His lip half trembled as it met my own.

O! should he e'er repent him he hath wed
A being burdened with a wo so dread;
Should he grow tired of one, so frail and weak,
My heart in that dark hour would joy to break!
Or should his lips grow cold—his hand unkind—
God help me, baby, then indeed I'm blind!

But shall I never see thee? Yes, my boy,
Some future hour my heart shall know that joy!
It may not be on earth, but in the skies,
I yet shall gaze, my darling, in thine eyes;
So I will patient be, for God is kind,
For in yon heaven not one eye is blind. [Bos. Jour.

PRESENT STATE OF THE SEVEN CHURCHES.

At a recent meeting of the Asiatic Society, the Secretary read a memoir, by Captain J. T. Newbold, on the present condition of the Churches of Asia, mentioned in the Revelation, which the writer has recently visited. He observes that the history of these interesting localities is well known; but their present condition has been little adverted to. He begins his account with the Church of Ephesus; the first mentioned by St. John, and that which still maintains its ecclesiastical superiority in giving a title to the Greek archbishop, while the others have only bishops at their heads, though it is low in statistical importance. The port of Ephesus is now choked up by a pestiferous morass, and lonely walls, tenanted only by the jackal, occupy the site of the once populous city. The village of Ayasalux stands about a mile from the ruins, and contains about forty scattered cottages, one tenanted by a Christian. The mosque of the village contains four granite columns, said to have belonged to the great temple of Diana, whose ruins are still visible near the port. The mosque is going to decay, like the Christian church, and every thing appears to be in the last stage of dissolution. Captain Newbold noticed that some of the granite which formed part of the ancient temple had exfoliated, evidently from extreme heat; and he suggested that this might have happened when the temple was consumed by fire. Smyrna, the most flourishing of the whole, is an increasing city. Its population, which, twenty years ago, was about 77,000, is now 130,000, and is rapidly increasing. There are five Greek, three Latin, and two Protestant churches. The Greeks have numerous schools, and the Latins a large college; but the Protestant schools have failed. The Greek Church at Smyrna continues in a flourishing condition. Pergamos is the most prosperous of the churches after Smyrna. The population is 16,000, of whom 14,000 are Turks, nearly all the rest Christians. The Christians' quarter contains two Greek churches and one Armenian. Close to the ancient church Captain Newbold found a Greek school, where the pupils were seated on marble tombstones, which formed the pavement of the school. He gives copies of three of the inscriptions there, none of which have been heretofore published. Thyatira is still a flourishing town. It had been lost to the Christian world from the fall of Constantinople, under the Turkish name of Alkhissar, until brought to light in the seventeenth century. The population is above 19,000, of whom 2,000 are Greek, and 120 Armenians, have each a church; the former is said to be on the site of the Apocalyptic church. Captain Newbold copied several inscriptions there. Sardis, the ancient capital of Crœsus, is now even more desolate than Ephesus. Scarcely a house remains. The melancholy Gyræen Lake, the swampy plain of Hermus, and the thousand mounds forming the necropolis of the Lydian monarchs, among which rises conspicuously the famed tumulus of Alyattes, produce a scene of gloomy solemnity. Massive ruins of buildings still remain, the wall of which is made up of sculptured pieces of Corinthian and Ionic columns, that once formed portions of the ancient Pagan temples. The Pactolus, famed for its golden sands, contains no gold; but the sparkling grains of mica, with which the sand abounds, have probably originated the epithet. Captain Newbold suggests that the singular tumuli of Sardis deserve to be opened, and recommends the subject to the attention of the Society. Philadelphia has a population of 10,000 Turks and 3,000 Greeks. It contains twenty-five churches, all small and mean, but containing fragments of ancient sepulchres. A massive ruin was pointed out as the church of the Apocalypse. Laodicea, whose fate had been forgotten for centuries, was brought to light in the seventeenth century. It was, and is, a mass of desolate ruins. The hills on which it stands have been supposed to be volcanic, but erroneously. They are composed of aqueous beds, chiefly limestone. [Church of Eng. Mag.

THE FIRST FAMILY PRAYER.

A gentleman with whom I am personally acquainted, for many years cast off fear and restrained prayer. He had no love for religion, nor respect for the Christian profession. He married a lady who was a professed Christian; but they agreed on the subject of religion to disagree. After some years he became a hopeful convert to the cross of Christ. He felt, as every child of God will feel, that he ought to erect a family altar, and gather his household around it, morning and evening. It was a solemn occasion; the husband, once stout-hearted and rebellious, but now penitent and subdued; the wife, weeping for joy at the mercy of God, which had visited her house, and at the answer which at length had been given to prayer long continued; and the children, wondering at the strange sight. All were together. As the husband and the father took in his hand the Book of God, to be the minister of his own house, he turned to his wife and said:

"I cannot begin this solemn service, and erect an altar here, without first acknowledging how much I am indebted to you, as instrumental, in the hands of God, of my conversion. On the day of my mariage, I had no confidence in religion. I was a mocker at the truths of God. I said, My wife professes to be a Christian; I will see, in her conduct, what religion is; I will know if there is any reality in the Christian profession. From that moment I have had my eye upon you. I have watched you in every position in which you have been placed. I have seen you in moments of joy and grief; in your relations to the family and to the church; in those hours of relaxation in which the mind is unbent; in those seasons of communion with your Saviour, when, with a firm voice and fervent spirit, you have prayed for my salvation, and when you knew not that my ear heard your petition. I have seen your joy, as you have clasped the new-born babe to your bosom; and I have witnessed your anguish as you have laid that babe in the cold and silent grave. I became satisfied that your religion was real; that it was actuated by a principle that I did not possess; that you were sustained by a power to which I was a stranger. To your holy walk, consistent life, and godly conversation, I owe my salvation."

Tears of gratitude choked his utterance; his wife, no longer able to control her feelings, burst into loud sobs and cries; the children blended their small voices with the voices of their parents; all fell upon their knees, and erected thus their first family altar.

SOLEMN ANECDOTE.

At an anniversary meeting, a short time since, I heard a very solemn annecdote related, which, with your permission, I will also relate. The preacher had for his text: "As he thinketh in his heart, so is he." It was a rambling, but yet a very searching discourse. In speaking of hypocrisy, he said he once heard an anecdote related by Mr. Eagleton, of Birmingham, which at the time he scarcely thought was suited for the pulpit, but as he had derived considerable benefit from it himself, his scruples had greatly subsided. Mr. Eagleton said that a friend of his was once preaching in a strange pulpit, and while preaching he was led to descant upon the sin and folly of drunkenness. He had not proceeded far when he noticed a person in one of the pews extremely fidgety and uneasy; and, supposing he might be writhing under the Word, the preacher did not spare, but poured out the solemn truth that he felt commissioned to declare, with more than usual pungency, till the fidgety gentleman could hardly keep his seat, and he expected to see him rise up and walk out. At the close of his sermon, he went to his lodgings, and what was his astonishment to find that the gentleman who had manifested this uneasiness was none other than his host, and alas! alas! a deacon of the church! He at once accosted the minister: "Sir, were those remarks upon drunkenness designed for me?" The minister then candidly told him that he knew nothing of his private character, but having been led to dwell upon the subject, and noticing the uneasiness of an unknown gentleman, he had certainly expatiated upon the crime, in hope of the Divine blessing, &c. At this the host threw open a cupboard and took out a bottle of spirits; and never, said the narrator, did a man look more like a demon—when, pouring out a glass of spirits, he uttered a most fearful oath—I cannot write it—drank off his glass—poured out another, and another, and another, till he had nearly emptied the bottle, when he fell down his full length upon the floor, and never uttered another word! ### THE SIX PRINCIPLE BAPTISTS.

In the Sermon of the Rev. W. E. Locke, preached at the centenary of the Baptist Church at Scotch Plains, New Jersey, he gives the following account of the rise of the Six Principle Baptists, as they are called:

"In the year 1794, Rev. James Manning settled in Warren, Rhode Island, where he opened a school for teaching the latin language. In October of the same year, in company with other ministering brethren, he constituted a Baptist church in the place of his residence, to which he became first pastor. In the year 1765, by his influence, a charter of incorporation for a Baptist college was obtained from the legislature of Rhode Island, of which he was appointed first president. This college is the same as the Brown University, the first, and best endowed, and most efficient of our higher seats of learning, the influence of which, in elevating the denomination, has, under God, been of the most advantageous character. In the year 1770, it was judged best, by the most active friends of the college, to remove it from Warren to Providence, and the friends of the institution at that place subscribed the most liberally toward erecting the college buildings. It was therefore removed, and Mr. Manning, its president, along with it. On his arriving in Providence, he found the church somewhat divided as to the course to be pursued toward himself. The aged pastor, Mr. Windsor, was violently opposed to singing in public worship, to which Mr. Manning was favorable. Mr. Windsor also regarded the laying on of hands as an indispensable service on receiving members into the church, but Mr. Manning left the ceremony to the choice of the candidate. The majority of the church were in favor of Mr. Manning participating with them at the Lord's table, while the minority were as strenuously opposed to it. This division of feeling proceeded so far, that, early in 1771, Mr. Windsor and his friends withdrew, and formed themselves into a new church, upon the basis of the six principles recorded in Hebrews vi. 1, 2, and they therefore received the name of the Six Principle Baptists."

CHRISTIAN CONVERSATION.

A young gentleman was requested by his father to light an aged friend to his home, one dark night in winter, in a country village. On the road the old gentleman said to him, "My young friend, will you try to remember the following words? 'Then they that feared the Lord spake one to another; and the Lord hearkened and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of Hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him. Then shall ye return and discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not." Mat. iii. 16–18." The boy went home and learned the passage; it was fixed upon his mind, so that he never forgot it. It is still a favorite text. He is now an active and pious minister, the rector of a large parish, and has the care of two thousand souls, who all look up to him as a father and friend. His influence reaches far and wide, and his example is producing the most beneficial effects, not only among his own people, but in the extensive city near which he resides. I mention this anecdote to encourage others to improve every opportunity that may present itself to implant divine truth in the youthful mind.

REPENTANCE PAYS NO DEBTS.

A lady in the vicinity of R—— being visited with a violent disorder, was under the necessity of calling medical assistance. Her physician was very latitudinarian in his notions, and endeavored to persuade his patient to adopt his creed as well as to take his medicine. He insisted with much dogmatism that repentance and reformation were all that either God or man could justly demand, and denied the life or necessity of an atonement by the sufferings of the Son of God. The lady had not so learned Christ; she adopted his prescriptions but rejected his creed.

On her recovery she invited the Doctor to tea, and requested him to make out his bill. The tea-table being removed, she observed, 'My long illness has occasioned you many journeys, and I suppose you have procured my medicines at considerable expense.' The doctor replied that 'good drugs were expensive.'

Upon this she observed, 'I am extremely sorry that I have put you to so much trouble and expense, and also promise that in any future illness I will never trouble you again. So you see I both repent and reform, and that is all you require.' The doctor shrugged his shoulders, and remarked, 'That will not do for me!'

INDUSTRY REWARDED.

A proud Welsh 'Squire took it into his head to be very angry with a poor curate, who employed his leisure hours in mending clocks and watches, and actually applied to Dr. Shipley, Bishop of St. Asaph, with a formal complaint against him, for impiously carrying on a trade. His lordship having heard the complaint, told the 'Squire he might depend upon it, that the strictest justice should be done in the case. Accordingly, the mechanic-divine was sent for a few days after, when the Bishop asked him—"How he dared to disgrace his diocese, by becoming a mender of clocks and watches?" The other, with all humility, answered, "To satisfy the wants of a wife and ten children!" "That won't do with me," rejoined the prelate; "I'll inflict such a punishment on you as shall make you leave off your pitiful trade, I promise you"—and immediately calling in his secretary, ordered him to make out a presentation for the astonished curate, to a living of at least £100 per annum.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, October 5, 1848.

A CATHOLIC "SABBATH."

"Sunday in Havana, like the Sabbath in all Catholic countries, is mostly devoted to amusement and military reviews—masquerading in the streets, dancing and grotesque performances in the public squares, being among the most innocent diversions of the day. The billiard rooms are in full blast, and gambling—that besetting sin of the indolent in most countries—is ruinously prevalent, as a Sunday amusement, among the fashionables of the capital, and indeed with the greater part of those who can get a few doubloons to risk on the turn of a card."

Paragraphs like the above are frequently met with in reading Protestant papers. We wonder it never occurs to their writers, that in thus reproving the Catholics they condemn themselves. The transferrence of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week was to a great extent the work of the Romish Church, and is so claimed by the most intelligent members of that church. Of course those who have authority to change the day of the Sabbath, have authority to dictate as to the manner in which it shall be observed, and accordingly the Catholic Church has decided that the day should be kept as a holiday, and not with that strictness which the fourth commandment is supposed to require. Now Protestants, by indirectly admitting the authority of the papal church to change the day of the Sabbath, and then denying its authority to dictate as to the manner of observing it, are guilty of a palpable inconsistency, which greatly weakens the force of all their reproofs. This inconsistency has frequently been thrown in their teeth when they have attempted to discuss with Catholics the points of difference between them, and has never, to our knowledge, been answered in a manner to satisfy even the Protestant friends of the first day. Luther seems to have foreseen this difficulty, and thought to escape it by denying all scriptural obligation to keep the Sabbath under what is called the Christian dispensation. But the effects of this denial were found to be most disastrous. The Puritans, seeing this, attempted to build up a Sabbath upon the fourth commandment, while they maintained that the day had been changed from the seventh to the first by divine authority. In this way they hoped to secure for the institution the sanction of God's commandment, without the inconvenience of changing the day which was commonly observed. But it has always been an up-hill business. Whenever they hold conventions upon the subject now-a-days, they are thrown into commotion at once if the change of the Sabbath is alluded to, particularly by a person who is supposed to be not altogether satisfied with the reasons usually urged for such change. One would think, from the manner in which doubts upon this subject are hushed up and discussion smothered, that an explosion was seriously apprehended in case the matter was at all disturbed. And we confess ourselves unable to say any thing to remove such apprehensions, for we believe that an explosion would be inevitable if free discussion should be allowed. However, we would suggest, for consistency's sake, if not for the sake of safety, that Protestants ought to be careful how they rebuke their Catholic neighbors for keeping the Sabbath as directed by the very authority which they themselves follow in relation to the change of the day. People who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

RESTORING THE COMMANDMENTS.

"The Second Commandment.—It is a significant fact, that the late Archbishop of Paris restored the second commandment to the place from which it had long been expelled, and to which it properly belonged, in the formularies of the Catholic Church. The same thing has been done by the Archbishop of Florence. The catechisms have now a complete decalogue. What a rebuke is this to the 'infallible church,' which could mutilate the law of God!"

Very significant and praiseworthy, no doubt, is this act of the Roman Catholic Archbishops, and we are glad to see that it is appreciated by their Protestant neighbors. There is another commandment, which has long been practically expelled from the formularies of both the Catholic and Protestant churches, and which we should be exceedingly glad to see restored also. We mean the fourth commandment of the Decalogue, which says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work; . . . . for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it." One would think this commandment too plain to be misunderstood. Yet in the very face of the inspired declaration, that "the seventh day is the Sabbath," and that "God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it he rested from all his work," the mass of Christians refuse to keep the seventh day, and have set up a rival institution, grounded upon entirely a different reason. God commands the observance of the seventh day, because that in it he rested from all his work. But Christian churches command the observance of the first day, because, as they say, on it Christ rose from the dead. Thus they change both the day of the Sabbath and the reason for its observance. What is this but to expel the fourth commandment from their creed? It does not mend the matter to appoint a weekly rest-day, and observe it ever so strictly, while the original Sabbath is neglected, or observed upon a different day and for a different reason. The Fourth of July is celebrated by all the people of this country as Independence Day, because on that day of the year 1776 the American Colonies declared themselves independent of the British Crown. But suppose a portion of the people should determine to celebrate the first day of August, because on that day of the year the Slaves in the British West India Islands were emancipated; and after celebrating the day until it had become popular, should put forth a declaration that the first day of August is Independence Day, and that the fourth of July should no longer be observed. Who would hesitate to pronounce such a declaration absurd, and to assert that those who make it have abandonod the celebration of Independence Day? Just so it is in regard to the Sabbath. For more than four thousand years the seventh day was observed as the Sabbath in commemoration of God's rest after completing the work of creation. At length a class of persons commenced observing the first day, under an impression that Christ rose from the dead on that day; in process of time, by the aid of courts and councils, the first day became the popular rest-day, while the seventh fell into disuse; and finally the observance of the seventh day was condemned, and the first day was declared to be the Sabbath. Now why should we hesitate to pronounce this declaration absurd, and to assert that those who make it have abandoned the Sabbath? No one would hesitate to make the assertion, if it did not condemn men and practices that are held in high esteem. But we are taught that some things which are highly esteemed among men are abominable in the sight of God. It may be so in this case, and we ought not, therefore, to hesitate about declaring what we see to be true. Let those neglecters of the seventh day who praise the Archbishops of Paris and Florence for "restoring the second commandment to the place from which it had long been expelled," consider that in approving such a course they condemn themselves for not pursuing a similar course in relation to the fourth commandment.

PROFESSION versus PRACTICE.

We are reputed a Christian community. More than three-fourths—possibly nine-tenths, of our adult population professedly regard the Bible as the book of God, Christianity as the only true religion, and its principles and precepts as the only infallible rule of duty. Christianity recognizes mankind as a human brotherhood, possessing a kindred nature, and designed to be mutual helpers. It enjoins mutual love, equal and practical; and prohibits isolation of interest, selfishness, and oppression It encourages, exalts, and blesses the poor, the humble, and the friendless; and frowns upon the proud and the oppressor. It says to all mankind, "Ye are brethren; let each seek the best good of all, and so will each promote his own happiness; show a practical approbation of virtue, whether it be clothed in rags or rich apparel, and discountenance vice, though it have an angel's garb; in a word, love God with all your heart, and your neighbor as yourself." Its own and only exact definition of religion is, "to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and keep yourself unspotted from the world."

These principles and precepts are theoretically received by a large majority of our people. But go to our public streets, and to our houses of business; go to our dwellings, and to our houses of worship; go into any and all the walks of social and civil life, and what agreement do we discover in the professions and the practices of man? Men of business, instead of making practical the golden rule, adopt for their motto, "No friendship in trade." The merchant conceals the defects in his commodity, over-estimates its value, and undervalues that belonging to his neighbor. In his purchases he says, 'It is naught, it is of a very inferior quality, and worth but little;' and in his sales he says of the same article, 'It is of superior quality, and very valuable;' so that it is notoriously true, that the essential qualification of a successful merchant is an aptness to deceive. The employer takes advantage of the needy circumstances of the employed, and the employed acts the part of an eye-servant to his employer. In the streets, instead of greeting the kindly countenances of brethren and friends, you are recognized only by those who are persuaded that such recognition will conduce to their honor or pecuniary profit. In the family, the injunctions to entertain strangers, to receive the outcast, and to invite only the poor to our feasts, are alike disregarded, or only fulfilled by making expensive entertainments for the rich, and sending the poor empty away. In our churches, dedicated to an impartial God, we find the congregations arranged according to the pecuniary circumstances of those who compose them, and the influence of the members measured by their worldly possessions. In society generally, the libertine or purse-proud cheat is respected, while the virtuous poor are treated with coldness and contempt. Those whose skill and labor produce all the wealth, embracing all our temporal comforts, have hardly enough to make life tolerable, while those who do no productive labor amass great riches. The various Christian denominations distinguish themselves and rear impassable walls by their avowed differences of opinion on doctrines which God never revealed, (to common minds at least,) and which in most cases have no bearing upon moral duty. Self-interest controls, to a fearful extent, both the pulpit and the press.

This is truly a dark picture of a nominally Christian community, but the facts would warrant darker shade, for I have not touched upon the more gross and palpable evils which exist in society. But we trust that a better time is coming. Intelligence is being diffused. Truth is being uttered. Men are beginning to think, and think each for himself. The oppressed are beginning to inquire why they are thus degraded. The wise and the good have espoused their cause, and men are returning to discern between right and wrong. Heaven speed the day when truth and right shall triumph over error and oppression, and the principles of Christianity become practical. GORDON.

MUSIC—NO. 2.

Nothing is more evident, than that singing is a refined medium for the expression of the heart's holy emotions, and the awakening of its most refined sensibilities. But the philosophy of music being understood, it appears that its effects on the sensibilities are proportionate to the degree of excellence in performance. The distinguishing characteristics of musical excellence are melody and harmony. The harmonious combination of melodious sounds chains the soul as it vibrates along its finest-toned chords, thus bringing the internal world with which man is endowed into comparison with the external with which he is surrounded. In man's internal sensibilities there is no discordant element. Whatever of discord from without is brought into comparison with this harmony within, awakens pain and disgust, for harmony without alone corresponds to harmony within. The simple emotion produced by this coincidence is followed, according to a permanent law of mind, by another termed a passion or desire to possess, as when we look upon a splendid carriage or stately edifice. In the instance of harmonious sound, this second emotion or passion follows by a uniform law of association. There is induced a desire to possess whatever engages the attention at the time the harmony is produced. If it be in connection with the duties of the sanctuary, it begets a passion for those duties. It may be truly remarked, that the church owes much of her success to the faithful performance of this part of her service. Experience shows, that the interest of most churches declines as their singing approaches to indifference. As it is the duty of all parents to train their children for religion, it is no less a duty to bestow on them qualifications to use the most efficient means to promote the interests of religion. Now, we have seen that music is one very efficient aid in the advancement of religion. It therefore becomes a duty to bestow a qualification to use this auxiliary. Again, experience abundantly proves, that nothing exerts a more powerful influence in securing that peace and harmony which characterize every well-regulated family circle. When parents and children, in sweet communion of soul, join their voices in sacred song, angels in heaven look down and smile.

Having thus premised that a knowledge of vocal music is necessary to fit us for the full discharge of life's duties, we may proceed to inquire where such knowledge shall be obtained. Shall the parent impart it? So far as parents may be able, they should second the efforts of teachers to impart this as well as other sciences. But may it not be made the subject of special instruction aside from other studies? So far as parents are able to employ a separate teacher for every branch of study, there certainly could be no objection; but this of course is not the case with the mass of people. It is true that an occasional course of lectures may be given on music, penmanship, &c., aside from the ordinary place of instruction, but never to the exclusion of those branches from such places. Those lectures should be sought only to refine and perfect what may have been begun elsewhere. But where shall they be begun? We answer, in the District School. In wisdom has the common school system been devised; but many blunders have been made in its prosecution, and in our opinion none greater than the leaving out from the branches there taught the science of vocal music. Upon what rule of discrimination is this exclusion made? The science certainly is not second in importance to those there taught; indeed, it is so intimately interwoven with some of them, that to separate them does great violence to both. The facilities for acquiring it are not greater elsewhere than for acquiring other sciences. No reflecting mind will for a moment urge the non-qualification of many teachers at present as an objection, for such an objection would at once prohibit the march of reform, as it would rest with equal force against the introduction of any new branch, as algebra, geometry, &c. The friends of education look hopefully for the day when, by the steady march of reform, our common schools and teachers shall be able to impart a more extensive course of instruction. But they would not receive as valid the objection that all teachers are not at present able to meet the demand, for teachers may not be expected to transcend the present demand. The only way to bring them up to the standard, is to make the demand, and when made, it will soon be met. The objection that all cannot learn to sing, involves an equal absurdity, for if it be admitted that one in a thousand is deficient in mental or physical ability to sing, does it follow that the nine hundred and ninety-nine shall therefore be deprived of its benefits? Or, will any one pretend that this unfortunate class are so numerous that a supply of teachers could not be obtained? With equal propriety it might be urged that reading should not be taught, because a few are deaf and dumb, and therefore would be deprived of employment. D. E. M.

Missionaries for India and China.—The Journal of Commerce says that the foreign missionary institutions of the United States contemplate sending out a large additional force during the coming month, amounting in all to about twenty-five. The ship Bowditch, which sails on the 9th of October, for Madras, takes out the following persons, under the A. B. C. F. M.: Cyrus T. Mills and wife, J. T. Noyes and wife, and Mr. Burnell, (printer,) wife and child, for the station of Ceylon; J. W. Dulles and wife, and Mrs. Myron Winslow, for the station at Madras, and Dr. Shelton and wife, for that at Madura. The Southern Baptist Board expect to send two missionaries and their wives to China in the ship Valparaiso, which sails Oct. 9th. The Rev. Messrs. Whilden and Goodale go about the same time, as well as four or six others from the Northern Baptist Board.

Blessing a Steamboat.—A Montreal paper tells of a "new and affecting ceremony" which took place in that port recently. The steamboat Jacques Cartier, which was about to leave for her regular voyage, was blessed by the hands of his grace the (Roman Catholic) Bishop of Montreal, in the presence of a large crowd of spectators. We are glad to see it stated, that the proprietors of the boat have conformed with the wishes of the Bishop by determining to have no bar for the sale of drink on board the Jacques Cartier. If such a result could be secured in every case, we should be glad to have all the steamboats blessed.

Another Missionary in China fallen.—It is announced that Mrs. Johnson, wife of the Rev. J. Johnson, Missionary of the American Baptist Union, at Hong Kong, China, has recently died. Her death took place in June, though the date is not mentioned. She had very recently reached that station. The missions in China have to mourn again and again this year. Mr. Clopton, Dr. and Mrs. James, and Mrs. Johnson. How many from such a small company, in such a brief space!

New Subscribers.—The editor of the New York Baptist Register acknowledges the receipt of one hundred new subscribers, "procured within a few months, by a single friend, within a few miles of his residence." Other papers occasionally acknowledge similar accessions to their subscription lists, showing that a little well-directed effort in this way can accomplish great and good results. We wish the fact might encourage some of our friends to "go and do likewise."

Baptist Seminary in Mississippi.—The Board of the Mississippi Baptist Convention, have appointed a committe to look out a suitable location for the establishment of a seminary of learning. This committee is empowered to receive propositions as to locations, from towns, neighborhoods, or churches, provided the same are accompanied with donations of a suitable lot of land, and an eligible building or buildings, in which operations may be commenced.

The Ragged Schools of London.—In four years the number of ragged schools in London has increased from twenty to more than sixty. About eighty paid teachers are now employed, and about 800 voluntary teachers. The average attendance of scholars for the past year was 5800 on Sundays, 3900 on week days, and 3500 on week evenings.

Ordination of Missionaries.—At the Samson-st. Baptist Church, Philadelphia, on the evening of Sept. 28, Samuel J. Smith and Henry L. Vanmeter were ordained as ministers of the Gospel. They are to engage as missionaries of the American Baptist Union, and will sail for Southern Asia soon—the former for Siam, the latter for Burmah.

The Nauvoo Temple.—We learn from a St. Louis paper, that an arrangement has been made with the trustees, or those having charge of the Mormon Temple at Nauvoo, by which that splendid edifice is to be devoted to a useful purpose. It has been leased for a term of fifteen years, and is to be at once converted into a college building, and to be occupied for that purpose. The institution is to be under the patronage of the Home Mission Society, and immediate steps will be taken to put it into operation. A better location cannot be found in the Western country for such an institution, and it will, if properly conducted, receive the patronage of all the States bordering upon the Mississippi.

How to Build a House of Worship.—The Herald of Religions Liberty mentions a church that resolved to build a meeting-house. They began a subscription with the design to raise $1200. They raised the subscription, and engaged workmen to build the house, who agreed to take the subscription list, and release the church, holding the individual subscribers alone responsible. The house was put up and paid for. The church is free from debt and bids fair to prosper. The whole taxable property of the members of the church was only $14,000, so that they gave nearly a tithe for the erection of their house.

Begg on the Sabbath.—We resume to-day the publication of Mr. Begg's work on the Sabbath. Those who have read the chapters which have already appeared, will, we are sure, be glad to learn that the remaining chapters are to be placed within their reach.

LOSS OF LIFE IN THE MEXICAN WAR.

There prevails throughout the community, and even among men of intelligence, a great mistake on this subject. Even Mr. Calhoun has spoken of some seven or eight thousand (!) as the sum total of lives lost in this war; and the specific official information called for in Congress, will probably give mainly, if not solely, the numbers fallen in battle. These, however, are not more, probably less, than a fifth, of the whole number that have perished; and we give this ratio as a clue to a right interpretation of official reports concerning the victims of this war.

To statements in preceding numbers on this subject we add a few items:—

Southern Regiments.—"The N. C. Regiment," says an officer writing from Buena Vista, in September, 1847, "was paid off the last of August on muster-rolls made two months previous, and almost every fifth man had died since muster. The Mississippi Regiment had suffered still more. Companies that came into the field eighty-five and ninety strong, now number scarcely thirty men on parade. These things will rob war of some of the brilliant gems with which newspaper paragraphs have decked it." An officer of the Georgia Infantry Battalion, writing from the City of Mexico, says, "Of nearly four hundred men who left Columbus in the five companies, we have not more than forty fit for duty. About thirty-five are in the hospital at Jalapa, and the remainder in that of Perote."

New York Regiment.—"Out of some 840 men who we numbered when we landed at Vera Cruz," says one of the number, under date of Jan. 13, 1848, "we have not now more than about 180 fit for duty."

Company from Connecticut.—"A small company of battered soldiers," says the Newark (N. J.) Advertiser, "passed through in the railroad train yesterday, on their way home from the battle-fields of Mexico, having had quite enough of gore and glory. One of them mentioned that he was the only survivor of twenty-one men who left Waterbury, Ct., about a year ago—a sad messenger to twenty heart-stricken families."

Company from Vermont.—The Rutland Herald, the editor of which has a brother, an officer, in the Mexican War, says, "Out of eighty members of the Vermont company, raised last summer for the Mexican War, forty-four have already died; and out of this number only two have been killed in battle, the others having fallen victims to the diseases incident to the climate."

Still another Company from New England.—"A soldier in company K, 9th regiment, writes to his home in Gardiner, Me., that his company had 72 men when it left Newport for Mexico, and at the time of writing but 24 were left, fit for duty; the remainder were sick or dead."

Now, make a calculation for yourself on the basis of the data here given. Cast up the sum total sent out in these cases; and you will find, when the precise numbers are given, that two-thirds of the whole were lost, and that too in less than one year, on an average, from the time of their entering the service. Nor is this all; for we are told that one regiment lost a fifth of its entire number in two months, another regiment a still larger proportion; and, at this rate, four-fifths would perish in a single year! More than half of the Vermont company died in less than a year, and of these only one in twenty-two, two out of the forty-four, in battle. In one case—the company from Connecticut—nineteen out of twenty died in less than a year! Now, we have sent to this war more than 70,000 in all; and, if you take the above rates of mortality, or any other we have yet seen, and calculate by the lowest one of them all, you will make the sum total of our own losses more than 30,000. Yet will interested demagogues deny or wink out of sight such facts as these, and conceal from the people as much as they can of the grim-visaged, blood-besmeared monster. [Advocate of Peace.

"Sabbath Accidents."—Finding the following items in our summary of news, we place them together for the better accommodation of those who may be anxious to know whether "Sabbath Accidents" occur on any other day of the week than Sunday:—

On Saturday, Sept. 23d, while the people of the upper part of the City of Reading, Pa., were raising a Cass and Butler pole, it broke in two, one-half falling upon and instantly killing an elderly and very worthy and respectable gentleman, by the name of Poor, long an inhabitant of the town, and well known.

A sad accident occurred at Tarrytown on Saturday, Sept. 23d, on Messrs. Eggleston, McDonald & McEntee's section of the New York and Albany Railroad, by the falling of a bank in one of the pits. A man named Morris Wade was killed, and three others severely hurt.

Three vessels loaded with wheat went ashore on the east bar at Oswego, on Saturday Sept. 23d, while trying to enter the harbor. The names of the vessels are President, Paragon, and Mahoning.

At a political meeting in Fauquier County, Va., on Saturday, 16th Sept., a difficulty arose between Enos Payne and Samuel Smoot, which resulted in Smoot being stabbed twice with a knife, which caused his death during the night. Mr. Payne surrendered himself to the civil authorities, and being acquitted by an examining court, was released from custody.

Nathaniel Thomas, of North Hanson, was so seriously injured on Saturday, while blasting rocks, that but faint hopes of his recovery are indulged.

Capt. John Nazro Prouty, of Spencer, was run over and almost instantly killed by the Brattleboro' stage, in Worcester, on Saturday afternoon.

☞ The Minutes of the Missionary Association and the Tract Society will be ready for distribution in a few days. A package will be put up for each church in the denomination, and we hope that our friends in the different sections will send for them by the first opportunity.

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship America arrived at New York on Friday last, in 13 days from Liverpool.

There has been a revolt in the South of Ireland, which has resulted in the loss of several lives. As to the causes of the movement, the London Daily News says, that "all who were on the spot and had facilities for ascertaining the facts, agree in stating that the movement was altogether of an agrarian character, and had no political object whatever. The impelling motives were poverty and privation, not the hope of political amelioration."

Lord John Russell has been summoned to attend the special commission at Clonmel, as a witness on the part of Smith O'Brien.

From France there is no news of special importance. On the 10th ult., as an officer was walking in the garden of Gen. Cavaignac's residence, in the Rue de Varennes, he was fired at, and there is little doubt he was taken for Gen. Cavaignac.

There has been another insurrection at Leghorn, during which the artillery swept some of the streets with grape, and were encountered by a brisk fire of musketry from the people. One account says that 112 soldiers were killed; another account says 60.

Letters and journals from Rome represent the condition of the Pope as precarious. Five cardinals had left the city at once, namely, Gizzi, Ferretti, Ossini, Lambruschini, and Della Genga. Report goes so far as to accuse Cardinal Ferretti of having conceived the very unlikely plan of summoning a conclave at Malta for the purpose of proceeding to the election of a new Pope, in case the chair of St. Peter should be vacated.

Messina has been taken by the Neapolitan troops, after a bombardment of the most frightful kind.

The Servian War still continues. A battle took place near the Roman encampments between Ternim and Sarek. It lasted two days, viz. the 28th and 29th Aug. The Hungarians, under the command of Messaros, were driven from their positions, and thrown back upon Gil Ker, where Gen. Bechthold succeeded in rallying the fugitives. Since that time, on the 2d, a combat took place at Perlass, in which the Hungarian troops succeeded in storming the camp of the insurgents, taking seven pieces of artillery and a number of prisoners. Ninety of the insurgents were killed.

A letter from Temeswer in the Banab, in the Oesterreichische Zeitung, states that the city of Weisskirchen has again been attacked by the Servians, who, on the 29th ult., bombarded it for eight hours, but were at length forced to retire, leaving 200 of their dead behind them.

Up to the 8th there had been 784 cases of cholera in Berlin, 484 of which were fatal. In Stettin, on the 5th, there had been 652, of which 433 were fatal. It has also appeared at Magdeburg, on the Elbe, and Vienna.

A GENUINE HERO.—When only a dozen helpless women and children remained on the burning wreck of the Ocean Monarch, paralyzed with fear, and wholly incapable of helping themselves, Frederick J. Jerome, a seaman of the American ship New World, stripped himself naked, made his way through the sea and wreck, and, with a line in his hand, succeeded in lowering the last helpless victim safely into the boats, being himself the last man to leave the wreck. On his arrival on board the Brazilian steam frigate Alfonso, he was received on the quarter deck by the Prince de Joinville, and Duke d'Aumale, who, shaking him by the hand, praised his gallantry in the most flattering terms, bestowing on him at the same time an ample gratuity. "We would rather have his emotions," says a New York journal, "than those of the proudest conqueror who has returned from the blood-saturated fields of Mexico."

☞ The hero mentioned above returned to New York a few days ago by the ship New World; and on Friday evening last, at a public meeting in the Mariner's church, he was presented with "the Freedom of the City," and a valuable gold box.

STEAM FACILITIES.—The steamship Europa, which left Liverpool for New York on the second of this month, had goods on board for a mercantile firm in this city, which were shipped on board the steamship Southerner, and reached here on Tuesday morning, making the time of transmission between Liverpool and this port several hours less than seventeen days. The merchandize was landed and disposed of the same day. The intelligence of the sale of the goods could have been transmitted by telegraph that day to New York, and as a steamer left Boston on the following day, for Europe, the shipper of the goods in Liverpool might have before him the result of the whole transaction in less than 30 days. [Charleston Cour. 23d.

OAT MEAL.—The Journal de Quebec, speaking of the great abundance of the oat crop this year in Lower Canada, says that the present very low price of this article is not likely to be of long continuance, it having been proposed to export considerable quantities in the shape of meal to Ireland, as a substitute for the failing potato crop. It contains much more nutritious matter than the potato, and was, before the introduction of wheat into many parts of Scotland, the principal food of a large number of the inhabitants.

OCCUPATIONS OF EMIGRANTS.—A table published by the Emigrant Agent at Quebec, gives some interesting details of the trades or callings of the 55,000 emigrants who arrived in Canada in 1847. The comparative number of mechanics is very small—829—or about one sixty-fifth part. Of laborers there were 23,239; of farmers and farm laborers, 11,391; of carpenters, 228; of cordwainers, 196; of tailors, 142; of black and white-smiths, 138; of millwrights, 115; of plasterers, 3; 1 sailmaker, 3 blockmakers, 3 cart-makers, 3 curriers, and 4 printers.

SUMMARY.

THE FAIR OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE opened at Castle Garden, in this city, on Tuesday of the present week. It is not easy to say, at this early stage of the exhibition, how it will compare with previous years, but some good judges think it will surpass any of its predecessors in the splendor and variety of the articles exhibited.

Owing to the terrible slaughter of the National Guards at the barricades of Paris, during the late insurrection, a new invention has been made, which is called moveable barracades. This is a strong, solid, thick wall of oak, lined with sheet iron. Holes are pierced for the guns of the guards posted behind it. The machine is pushed forward on wheels.

A fatal case of the Asiatic cholera has occurred in London. An inquest was held over the body, and a surgeon who conducted the examination said he fully concurred in the opinion that the cholera is not contagious, and also that the use of a good deal of spice, especially cayenne pepper, is advisable in a damp season like the present.

Right Rev. Dr. Meis, Bishop of Vancouver, in Oregon, arrived at Dubuque, Iowa, on the 22d August. He left Walla Walla on the 20th of March last, and crossed the Rocky Mountains alone and on foot. In many places, he says, the snow was twenty feet deep. He is on his way to Europe.

James Fennimore Cooper, the Novelist, who has instituted so many suits for libel against editors, has recently become himself the subject of a prosecution; a suit having been instituted against him, by a clergyman named Tiffany, at Albany, N. Y., for charging him with being a liar and a scoundrel, unfit to preach, &c. The defendant has put in pleas justifying his various charges.

A meeting of the colored people of Chicago, Ill., was held on the 11th ult., for the purpose of taking measures to procure the repeal of the "unjust and partial law existing in the State of Illinois, which excludes the Free Man of Color from all access to Law by Oath, and thereby renders him dumb, so that he cannot be a party in law against a white man."

The Matamoras Flag gives an account of a Mexican female dwarf, as small as Tom Thumb, and describes her as being 15 years old, and 25 inches high, symmetrically proportioned, and weighs only 18 pounds. She has always enjoyed good health, is lively, intelligent, and is in all respects a well developed woman, except in size. She is the nineteenth child of her parents, and three younger than herself—all the family, with the one exception, being ordinary sized.

A telegraphic dispatch from Syracuse, dated Sept. 19, says:—"As the train of cars was going west this evening, it was followed by an engine, which ran into the rear car near Auburn, smashing that and breaking two or three of the others badly. One man was seriously injured, and some half dozen others more or less scalded and bruised by the accident."

The Chronotype says that the waters of Cape Ann are swarming with No. 1 mackerel. On Tuesday, within a circumference of six miles, there were over six hundred vessels engaged in catching this favorite fish. It is supposed, says the Transcript, that at least twelve thousand barrels were taken, valued at $100,000.

The Malta papers state that the American transport Supply had left that place to bring back the officers and crew of the store-ship employed in exploring the Dead Sea, but owing to the sick state of the men, Lieut. Lynch had chartered a French brig and sailed for Malta, but had not arrived, though twenty-two days out.

In New Haven, on Monday night, an intemperate man named Murrill attacked his wife with a knife. She was holding a child at the time, but letting it fall, she seized the blade of the knife, and both were severely cut. He then cut his throat, but not fatally.

Ivey S. Lane, a railroad passenger, near Macon, Georgia, was killed by a fall while running with an axe to the relief of the fireman, whose foot had been caught in a tank by the cars running off the track.

The house of Lawrence Harter, Esq., in Warren, Herkimer Co., N. Y., was recently destroyed by fire, and, sad to tell, two children of Mr. H. were consumed in the flames. The parents were absent when the fire broke out.

A telegraphic dispatch from Buffalo says that the propeller Goliah, bound down with a cargo of copper from Sault St. Marie, burst her boilers on Tuesday night, and all on board are supposed to have been lost.

In a slander case before the New York Court of Common Pleas, recently, Carpenter vs. Sheldon, a verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff for $9,375.

On the 17th of October the New York Baptist State Convention meets in Rochester. Mr. and Mrs. Wade, Mr. and Mrs. Vinton, and Mr. Osgood, returned missionaries, with several Karen converts, are expected to be present.

Both Houses of the British Parliament, in answer to the numerous petitions of Temperance Societies, have passed a bill prohibiting all sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday morning and forenoon.

The amount of losses by the insurance companies of New York and other places, in consequence of the late fire in Brooklyn is not far from $350,000.

During the dog days, 3,000 dogs were killed by order in New York, costing the corporation $1,500.

During the last five months, the Agents of the New Orleans Bible Society disposed of three thousand five hundred and fourteen Bibles and Testaments, published in eleven different languages.

The graduating class at Newton Theological Institution (Baptist) the present year consisted of only five.

We learn that Gerrit Smith has changed his views in regard to baptism, and is soon to be immersed.

It is estimated that over 10,000 vessels arrived in Boston during the past year, with an aggregate of more than 100,000 seamen.

Mr. Bruna Hascart, of Cincinnati, and probably one of the first opticians in America, has just completed a telescope of large size, ranging in magnifying power from 100 to 1,000. It is a refractor, and it is said by those capable of judging, and drawing comparisons from observation, that it operates nearly, if not quite, as well as the great refractor on Mount Adams. The workmanship is as perfect as mechanical skill can make it, and, as a whole, the instrument is a strong and incontrovertible argument against the expensive folly of sending abroad for the like. [Cincinnati paper.

The Boston Traveler, of Sept. 30, says, that it is now very generally conceded, that the crop of late potatoes in this State, is almost entirely free from rot, and will give a large yield. The early potatoes, on the contrary, were more or less tainted. The same may be said of Connecticut in reference to the winter potatoes. Good Chenangoes can be bought there for forty-five cents a bushel; other qualities for forty cents and under.

We learn from the Traveler, that the Turkish brig Ararat, Capt Metexa, from Constantinople, arrived at Boston, Sept. 28, after a good run of about 80 days. The Ararat is the first vessel of the Turkish nation that ever visited that port. She is manned altogether by Turks. Her commander, Capt. Metexa, is a fine-looking man, and in his dress (sack and trowsers) and general appearance bears but little resemblance to the bearded and bigoted Turk of a century since. Turkey has made great progress in civilization within the last dozen years.

The Lexington (Mo.) Express gives the particulars of a revolting case of murder and suicide which occurred in Saline Co., on the 14th ult. It appears that Mr. Baker, who had formerly borne a good character, attempted an incestuous intercourse with his own daughter, was repulsed, subsequently murdered the young lady, and ended the tragedy by committing suicide.

Kosciusco, the hero of Poland, wishing to make a present to a clergyman, sent it by a young man, and desired him to take the horse which he himself usually rode. On his return the young man said, that he would never ride his horse again unless he gave his purse at the same time; for, said he, "as soon as the poor man in the road takes off his hat and asks for charity, the horse immediately stops, and will not stir till something is given to the petitioner; and as I had but little money with me, I was obliged, when it was gone, to feign giving something, in order to satisfy the horse."

George Williams, alias "Slappy," who was committed by the Recorder of Philadelphia, upon the charge of participating in the robbery of Dr. Darlington, President of the Chester County Bank, on the 23d December last, has made restitution of $12,000 of the stolen money. Developments are being made in this matter that will astonish the community, and will result in bringing to the bar of public justice those who have too long reveled in crime with profit and impunity.

Mr. Skinner, the florist of the Wilmington (Del.) Cemetery, has recently introduced a new variety of the cucumber. They grow to the extraordinary length of nearly two feet, and resemble serpents coiled up among the vines. They are said to be superior to the common cucumber, being more free from seeds, and equally well flavored. With good culture they are said to grow even to a much larger size.

An improved strainer for milk pails has been recently invented by Mr. Wm. Cooley, of Geneva, N. Y., who has applied for letters patent for his invention. His plan is to have the strainer fit on the tube or spout of the pail by a screw or slide, so that it can be put on and taken off at pleasure, thus rendering the strainer easier cleaned, and at the same time, one strainer will answer for a number of pails better than a seive, and at one-fifth the expense.

The present season has been unusually sickly in Lynn, Mass. In August, there were seventy-five deaths, and from the 1st to 7th Sept., there were twenty-three. The average annual deaths number about two hundred and fifty. In the burial ground in the eastern part of the town, where about half that number are interred annually, in August, fifty-six interments were made. Many adults are included in the number, from a peculiar fatal type of the diarrhœa.

The amount of gold coined at the United States Mints for 24 years prior to 1847, was $12,742,653, a little exceeding the average of half a million a year. Last year there were three million tons of Pennsylvania anthracite coal received at tide water. This was equal in value to the whole of the gold dug in the South for the 24 years.

It is stated in the Boston Advertiser of the 25th, that on the night of the 21st–22d, Mr. Bond, the astronomer of the University at Cambridge, obtained observations by which he ascertained the existance of an eighth Satellite of the planet Saturn. Till this time, this Satellite has been undiscovered, though Mr. Bond has for some time suspected its existence.

A fop is physically a man dressed in the extreme of fashion, intellectually an idiot, and morally nothing. His most prominent traits of character are vanity, selfishness, idleness and ignorance. Sensible men look upon him with disgust and contempt, for they feel that in him humanity is disgraced.

America Ross, a little girl whom her school fellows in Cincinnati locked into a room to frighten her, jumped from the third story window to the ground, breaking her arm, but not receiving any fatal injury.

The Catholic Church, South Boston, erected in 1844 at an expense of about $50,000, was destroyed by fire Thursday night. It contained an organ worth $5000, and other valuable property, almost the whole of which was consumed.

On Sabbath morning, Sept. 23, the Helderbergs, near Albany, were capped with snow, and as low down as Kingston there was a fall of snow. Nine miles East of Troy the fall reached 2 inches.

When the school-house was struck by lightning in Reading, some days ago, a stove funnel was turned wrong side out by the fluid—just as one would turn a stocking.

The rapidity of the rise of real estate in Cincinnati, is well illustrated by a statement made in the Times, by Mr. Wm. V. Barr, son of the late Wm. Barr, owner of the "Barr Farm." Mr. B. has been investigating the matter, and states that his father gave $33 50 per acre for this property in the year 1811; "thus," says Mr. Barr, "paying $355 50 for what, at this day, on an average of $30 per foot, which is low, is worth $9,304,000, without reference to the buildings thereon.

The New Haven Journal states that within the last three years, Mr. Wm. Goodwin, of that city, has watched with the sick, eight hundred and forty-two nights. Beat that if you can. Mr. Goodwin has a heart which leads him in the direction of the sick, or wherever there is suffering, just as the wounds of the plundered Jew attracted the good Samaritan.

The Derry (Eng.) Sentinel states that a man named M'Call, caught a small sole a few days ago. He was about to kill it by biting its head, when it sprung from his hand into his throat. His brother tried to pull it out, but it was so firmly fixed that he could not succeed, and M'Call died in a few minutes. A man was killed by a similar accident in the north some time since.

The Committee appointed in the city of Albany to take charge of funds remitted for the relief the sufferers by the late fire, have thus far distributed $13,482. Money has been paid to 700 persons, and 489 have been made the recipients of clothing, &c.

A member of the Hartford Insane Retreat, who jumped from the stone-bridge into the river, last week, was restored to his reason by the shock, and has given no evidence of insanity since.

During the Session of Kent County (Md.) Court, last week, Mrs. Sarah Campbell obtained a verdict of $1,500 damages against Saml. Ringgold, for a breach of promise of marriage.

Letters were recently received, announcing the death of Mr. Y. H. Weed, at Singapore, and of Lieut. Dale, attached to the Dead Sea Expedition.

SCRAPS FROM MY LOG-BOOK.

I. EMBARKATION.

It's not a trifling thing to try
The perils of the sea,
And from the happiest home to hie
Away reluctantly.

II. PHOSPHORESCENCE.

Our earthly joys would seem to be
Like phosphor-sparks on midnight sea,
So gaily round us dancing;
They wave and glitter to and fro,
They quickly come and quickly go—
Seen only while they're glancing.

III. "ENDS ALL WELL."

Recording thus on memory's page,
May conscience daily tell,
As swiftly we advance in age,
That "all with us is well."

And when this voyage is o'er at last,
Our final reckoning come,
O may we hear the sentence pass'd—
"Ye faithful ones, well done!"

THE DEAD SEA EXPEDITION.

Lieut. M. F. Maury contributes a most interesting article to the Southern Literary Messenger, concerning the circumnavigation and exploration of the Dead Sea; from which we learn that it was for the first time successfully circumnavigated the past year by a party of Americans connected with the Navy. Only one traveler, Mr. Cortigan, had ever circumnavigated the Dead Sea, and he had died at the termination of his voyage, without leaving any journal or notes behind. This may appear strange when we consider the number of scientific gentlemen and travelers that have visited the Sea and its vicinity. The fact that it had not been successfully circumnavigated before, is probably owing, in a great measure, to a circumstance mentioned by other travelers, that there was not a boat or raft in the whole country, from the Sea of Galilee, upon which Peter and his associates used to have their ships, to the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, upon which a person so disposed might navigate its waters. And, indeed, had there been any such, of ordinary construction, on the Sea of Galilee, it would hardly have been useful in such an enterprise, from the danger attending its passage through the Jordan. And the success of the present effort is probably owing more to the wise adaptation of means to the end, than to superior abilities otherwise.

Lieut. Lynch, who planned and executed this most interesting service, foresaw this difficulty, and knew how to meet the demands of the case. His plan was to get the metalic life-boats, recently invented and patented by Joseph Francis of this city, and manufactured at the Novelty Iron Works by Messrs. Stillman, Allen, & Co. These he proposed to have so constructed that they could be divided, and thus made transportable from the Mediterranean to the Sea of Galilee, and there be readily put together and launched upon its bosom. To the credit of our Government, the ingenious proposal of Lieut. Lynch was approved, and Messrs. Stillman, Allen, & Co. were ordered to construct two boats of suitable dimensions, one of iron and one of copper; and the store-ship Supply, then about to visit the Mediterranean, was ordered to take them and Lieut. Lynch and party on board, and land them at a convenient point on the Levant. The boats were respectively named Fanny Mason and Fanny Skinner.

On their arrival at their destination, their troubles began, and in their march to Lake Tiberias, their boats had to be transported over the most formidable mountain gorges and heights, and to be lowered down precipices with ropes. But these difficulties were surmounted with true sailor skill and perseverance, and on the 8th of April the two Fannies, each with the American ensign flying, were upon the beautiful blue waters of the Sea of Galilee. "Emblematic of its Master, it alone, of all things around them, remained the same. Just as the apostles saw it when our Saviour said to it, 'Peace, be still,' this little band of rovers now beheld it."

The navigation of the Jordan was found to be most difficult and dangerous, from its frequent and fearful rapids. Lieut. Lynch solves the secret of the depression between Lake Tiberias and the Dead Sea by the tortuous course of the Jordan, which, in a distance of sixty miles, winds through a course of two hundred miles. Within this distance Lieut. Lynch and his party plunged down no less than twenty-seven threatening rapids; besides many others of less descent. The difference of level between the two seas is over a thousand feet.

The water of the Jordan was sweet to within a few hundred yards of its mouth. The waters of the Sea were devoid of smell, but bitter, salt, and nauseous. Upon entoring it, the boats were encountered by a gale, and "it seemed as if the bows, so dense was the water, were encountering the sledge-hammers of the Titans instead of the opposing waves of an angry sea."

The party proceeded daily with their explorations, making topographical sketches as they went, until they reached the southern extremity of the Sea, where the most wonderful sight that they had yet seen awaited them.

"In passing the mountain of Uzdom (Sodom) we unexpectedly, and much to our astonishment," says Lieut. Lynch, "saw a lage rounded, turret-shaped column, facing south-east, which proved to be of solid rock-salt, capped with carbonate of lime, one mass of crystalization. Mr. Dale took a sketch of it, and Dr. Anderson and I landed with much difficulty, and procured specimens from it."

The party circumnavigated the Lake, returned to their place of departure, and brought back their boats in as complete order as they received them at New York. They were all in fine health. The whole cost of this scientific exploration of the Dead Sea [except, of course, the cost of equipage and maintenance of the crew of the ship] was but seven hundred dollars.

From the letters of Lieut. Lynch, quoted by Lieut. Maury, we transcribe some interesting facts elicited by the exploration.

"The bottom of the northern half of this Sea is almost an entire plain. Its meridional lines at a short distance from the shore scarce vary in depth. The deepest soundings thus far, 188 fathoms, (1,128 feet.) Near the shore the bottom is generally an incrustation of salt, but the intermediate one is soft mud with many rectangular crystals—mostly cubes—of pure salt. At one time Stellwager's lead brought up nothing but crystals.

"The southern half of the Sea is as shallow as the northern one is deep, and for about one-fourth of its entire length, the depth does not exceed three fathoms, (18 feet.) Its southern bed has presented no crystals, but the shores are lined with incrustations of salt, and when we landed at Uzdom, in the space of an hour, our foot-prints were coated with crystalization.

"The opposite shores of the peninsula and the west coast present evident marks of disruption.

"There are unquestionably birds and insects upon the shores, and ducks are some times upon the Sea, for we have seen them—but cannot detect any living thing within it; although the salt streams flowing into it contain salt fish. I feel sure that the result of this survey will fully sustain the scriptural account of the cities of the plain."

He thus speaks of Jordan: "The Jordan, although rapid and impetuous, is graceful in its windings, and fringed with luxuriance, while its waters are sweet, clear, cool, and refreshing."

After the survey of the Sea, the party proceeded to determine the height of mountains on its shores, and to run a level thence via Jerusalem to the Mediterranean. They found the summit of the west bank of the Dead Sea more than 1,000 feet above its surface, and very nearly on a level with the Mediterranean.

"It is a curious fact," says Lieut. Maury, "that the distance from the top to the bottom of the Dead Sea should measure the height of its banks, the elevation of the Mediterranean, and the difference of level between the bottom of the two seas, and that the depth of the Dead Sea should be also an exact multiple of the height of Jerusalem above it."

Another not less singular fact, in the opinion of Lieut. Lynch, is "that the bottom of the Dead Sea forms two submerged plains, an elevated and a depressed one. The first, its southern part, of slimy mud covered by a shallow bay; the last, its northern and largest portion, of mud and incrustations and rectangular crystals of salt—at a great depth, with a narrow ravine running through it, corresponding with the bed of the river Jordan at one extremity, and the Wady 'el Jeib,' or, 'wady within a wady,' at the other."

"The slimy ooze," says Lieut. Maury, "upon that plain at the bottom of the Dead Sea, will not fail to remind the sacred historian of the 'slime pits,' in the vale, where were joined in battle 'four kings with five.'"

DESCRIPTION OF POMPEII.

Pompeii is getting daily disencumbered, and a very considerable portion of this Grecian city is unveiled. We entered by the Appian way, through narrow streets of marble tombs, beautifully executed, with the name of the deceased plain and legible. We looked into the columbary below that of Marius Aurrius Diomedes, and perceived jars containing the ashes of the dead, with the small lamp at the side of each. Arriving at the gate, we perceived a sentry box, in which the skeleton of a soldier was found, with a lamp in his hand. Proceeding up the street beyond the gate, we went into several streets, and entered into what is called a coffee-house, the marks of cups being visible on the stone; we came likewise to a tavern, and found the sign (not a very decent one) near the entrance. The streets are lined with public buildings and private houses, most of which have their original painted decorations fresh and entire. The pavement of the streets is much worn by carriage wheels, and holes are cut through the side stones for the purpose of fastening animals in the market-place; and in certain situations are placed stepping stones, which give us a rather unfavorable idea of the state of the streets. We passed two beautiful little temples; went into a surgeon's house, in the operation room of which chirurgical instruments were found; entered an iron-monger's shop, where an anvil and hammer were discovered; a sculptor's and baker's shop, in the latter of which may be seen an oven and grinding mills, like old Scotch querns. We examined likewise an oilman's shop, and a wine shop lately opened, where money was found in the till; a school, in which was found a small pulpit, with steps up to it, in the middle of the apartment; a great theatre; a temple of justice; an amphitheatre about 220 feet in length; various temples; a barrack for soldiers, the columns of which are scribbled with their names and jests; wells, cisterns, seats, tricliniums, beautiful Mosaic altars, inscriptions, fragments of statues, and many other curious remnants of antiquity. Among the most remarkable objects was an ancient wall, with part of a still more ancient marble frieze, built in it as a common stone; and a stream which had flowed under this once subterraneous city long before its burial; pipes of Terra Cotta to convey the water to the different streets; stocks for prisoners, in one of which a skeleton was found. All these things incline one almost to look for the inhabitants, and wonder at the desolate silence of the place.

The houses in general are very low, and the rooms are small, I should think not above ten feet high. Every house is provided with a well and a cistern. Every thing appears to be in proportion. The principal streets do not appear to exceed 16 feet in width, with side pavements of about three feet; some of the subordinate streets are from six to ten feet wide, with side pavements in proportion; these are occasionally high, and are reached by steps. The columns of the barracks are about fifteen feet in height; they are made of tuffa with stucco; one-third of the shaft is smoothly plastered, the rest fluted to the capital. The walls of the houses are often painted red, and some of them have borders and antique ornaments, masks, and imitation of marble; and in general poorly executed. I have observed on the walls of an eating-room, various kinds of food and game tolerably represented; one woman's apartment was adorned with subjects relating to love, and a man's with pictures of a martial character. Considering that the whole has been under ground upwards of seventeen centuries, it is certainly surprising that they should be as fresh as at the period of their burial. The whole extent of the city, not one-half is excavated, may be about four miles.

SYMPATHETIC INKS.

Sympathetic, or secret inks, are those fluids which, when written with on paper, are invisible when dry, but become visible, and acquire color, by simply heating the paper, or by applying to the invisible writing another chemical agent. The writing with these inks may be made to become visible or invisible successively, by treating as directed.

GREEN INK.

If letters be traced on paper with muriate of cobalt, the writing is invisible; but by holding it before the fire the characters speedily assume a beautiful green color, which again disappears as the paper cools. A very pretty effect is produced by drawing the trunk and branches of a tree with the fast ink in the ordinary manner, end tracing the leaves with the sympathetic ink as above. The tree appears lifeless till the paper is heated, when it suddenly becomes covered with a foliage.

BLUE INK.

This ink, which may be used like the preceding, may be prepared in the following manner:

Take one ounce of cobalt reduced to powder, put it into a Florence flask, and pour into it two ounces of pure nitric acid. Expose the mixture to a gentle heat; and when the cobalt is dissolved, add, by small quantities, a solution of potash, until no more precipitate ensues. Let this precipitate subside; decant the supernatant fluid, and wash the residuum repeatedly in distilled water, until it passes tasteless; then dissolve it in a sufficient quantity of distilled vinegar, by the assistance of a gentle heat, taking care to have a saturated solution, which will be known by part of the precipitate remaining undissolved after the vinegar has been on it for some time.

SILVER INK.

Write on paper with a dilute solution of sulphur acetate of lead of commerce; the writing will be invisible. To make the characters legible, hold the paper whilst the letters are still wet, over a saucer, containing water impregnated with sulphuretted hydrogen gas; the characters then assume a brilliant metalic and iridescent color.

YELLOW INK.

Write on paper with a dilute solution of muriate of copper; the letters when dry will be invisible; but if the paper be warmed before the fire, the writing will assume a yellow color, and disappear again when the paper is cold.

BROWN INK.

Write on paper with a solution of nitrate of silver, sufficiently diluted, so as not to injure the paper; the characters, when dry, will be invisible, and remain so, if the paper be closely folded up, or if the writing is, in any other way, defended from the light; but if the paper be exposed to the rays of the sun, or merely to the common light of day, the characters speedily assume a brown color, and lastly turn black.

SEVEN LANGUAGES AND NO BREAD.

A poor wretch, about sixty years of age, dressed in rags, was lately taken into custody at Tarascon, accused of theft. The following is the singular story he related of himself on the first examination.

"My name is Joseph Arribe, and I am a native of Marseilles. My father was a manufacturer of that town; but having been unsuccessful in his affairs, he determined upon leaving his native land. He went to Tripoli, and took me along with him.

"His trade succeeded, and he lived comfortable. He married a Jewess, and my step mother ill-treated me soon after. I had patience for some time, but finding I could no longer remain under the parental roof, I asked my father's leave to quit it. My father consented, and gave me 600f. I repaired to Smyrna with letters of recommendation, and as I was acquainted with several languages, I became an interpreter for merchant ships.

After some years, feeling desirous to visit my native land, I returned to Marseilles, where I continued my profession of interpreter—French, English, Spanish, German, Arabic, and Turkish. Lately, on my return from a long voyage to the West Indies, I conceived the project of going to visit one of my uncles, a gardener at the Fontaine de Nismes. I there heard my uncle died eighteen months before my arrival.

"I had spent all my money; I was arrested and detained in prison ten days; I was then set free, and was then returning to Marseilles, when, on my arrival at Taranscon, I entered the inn called the Bras'dor; I had five sous in my pocket, and I demanded half a bottle of wine and a bed. Both were granted me. The cold was excessive. I was dressed in summer clothes; a pair of cotton trousers, and a smock frock of the same material, were both in rags, and I was without a shirt.

"On entering the room I saw in one corner a good pair of pantaloons in grey cloth, and a jacket to suit. The temptation was very strong. I went to bed, but the next day, in lieu of my cotton clothes, I put on the grey clothes, which seemed to have been made to fit me. Thus dressed up I presented myself before the landlord, who, recognizing his own clothes, requested me to take them off directly, and threatened me with the police. I made no resistance.

"I resumed my old rags, and after having paid my expenses, set off. Scarcely had I gone some steps, when a police agent laid hold of me and took me into custody. Behold me now at the disposal of the tribunal, possessor of seven languages and without a morsel of bread."

THE RETORT COURTEOUS.—Two ministers of the same name resided in the same town—one a Dissenter, and the other a clergyman of the Established church. A parcel came into the hands of the latter, which, on inspection, proved to be for the Dissenter. It was forwarded, with the following note:—"Sir, if you had not assumed a title to which you have no right, this mistake would not have occurred. I am, sir, &c." In the course of a few weeks after, a parcel came into the hands of the Dissenter, which was for his reverend namesake, and which was found to contain a case of lithographed sermons, done up to imitate manuscript. It was forwarded to the clergyman, with the following retort: "Sir, if you had not assumed an office for which you are not qualified, this mistake would not have occurred. I am sir, &c."

HOW TAR AND TURPENTINE ARE GOT.

The principal pursuits of the inhabitants in many places near the sea-coast of the Southern States is that of getting turpentine. It is made from the pines with which they abound, almost to the exclusion of every other forest tree. Many persons have no other means of livelihood than this employment, especially those of the poorer classes.

As soon as the sap begins to run in the season, a notch is made near the root of the tree to catch the turpentine. This is called boring the tree. Thon it is dipped out generally with a simple gourd into buckets, which are emptied into barrels on the spot. These are ready for market as soon as they are filled.

Another small portion of the tree is pared off, and the sap again descends freely into these receptacles. Under this operation, a pine will usually live for six or seven years, and is used in this manner until it is thus deprived of its bark and a small portion of its trunk to the height of ten or fifteen feet.

One man, it is calculated, can attend 7,000 boxes in a season, and will collect from one hundred to three hundred barrels of turpentine in a year. The old trees, when they can yield no more turpentine, are cut up into small pieces, and then piled in heaps to make tar, which is only turpentine heated and smoked. The whole is then covered carefully with dirt, and a smothering fire is kept up beneath. As the wood slowly burns out, the tar runs from beneath into gutters prepared for its reception.

While burning, the kiln is carefully watched day and night. One hundred barrels of tar are usually made at one burning. When the kiln is burned out, the charcoal still remains from the wood, and becomes also an article of use and value.

A NOBLEMAN'S ESTATE.—The English papers are full of accounts of the great sale of the Duke of Buckingham's effects in England. This nobleman, formerly one of the richest in the realm, has, by a course of extravagance and profligacy, reduced himself to bankruptcy. All the furniture, pictures, plate, and articles of virtu, in his celebrated mansion of Stowe, are accordingly to be brought to the hammer. The catalogue occupies 271 pages, and the sale will continue thirty five days. The manor of Stowe has been in the Buckingham family ever since the Reformation, before which period, and since the Norman Conquest, it belonged to the Church. The house stands in a park of 400 acres. The principal entrance to the grounds is through a Corinthian arch, 60 feet high and 60 wide. The palace is 916 feet long, by 454 wide. The principal saloon is 60 feet long, 43 feet wide, 56 1-2 high, and cost $60,000. The grounds are filled with temples, statues, &c., and the palace with pictures, statues, books, prints, bronzes, manuscripts, old China, Hindoo trophies, stuffed birds, old tapestries, &c. The service of plate is of gold and silver, weighs three tons, and is worth nearly a million of dollars. Among the curious articles to be sold, are the silver toilet tables belonging to the first Duke, the favorite of James I. and Charles I. The whole of the articles at Stowe, cost probably, $25,000,000.

CAMEL'S FOR MAIL CARRIERS.—A correspondent of the Louisville (Ky.) Democrat proposes the use of Bactrian camels for travelling to California, New-Mexico and Oregon. They would be very useful for carrying the mail. Good authorities state that they can carry 1,000 pounds weight 100 miles per day, for eight or ten days in succession, and subsist on a scanty supply of the coarsest herbage, only requiring water once in two or three days. "With the aid of this animal, the United States mail might be carried from St. Louis, Mo. to Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia, in twenty days, or in a shorter time from the mouth of the Arkansas river to the harbor of San Francisco, in California. At a comparatively small expense, and within two or three years, a monthly or even weekly mail might be established between these points. They could be got in their native country, Asia, and brought by land to the Black Sea, and shipped for the United States direct. A sufficient number would, no doubt, be bought by the Government to insure a permanent stock of these valuable animals for our great western regions. In addition, it may be said, that the Bactrian or Asiatic camel would be useful in war in the vast plains of the West. From their great power, quickness of motion, docility, and shape of their backs, they might be useful in carrying light pieces of artillery, and be trained to the use of them for their various purposes. This would be a very effective arm against Indians.

INCREASE OF RAILROADS.—According to an article in the New York Herald, there will be more miles of railroad opened this year than in any previous one since these works were first commenced in this country. Independent of the many new lines about being completed, the extension of old roads is progressing very rapidly, and sections of country most remote from the Atlantic have been connected with the principal markets of the Union. About three hundred miles of railroad will be brought into use this year in the State of New York; about five hundred in New England; in New Jersey thirty miles; Ohio, fifty miles—making in these States nearly nine hundred miles of road. Besides this, there are at least one hundred miles in progress, part of which will be completed in 1849.

An Irish washerwoman was complaining of her hardships to her husband, who was sometimes in the habit of flagelating her. He endeavored to persuade her that her complaints were groundless, and among other arguments, remarked that she had always had "a plenty of wood and wather in the house." "An ye may well say that," she keenly retorted, "I'll always have plenty o' that while I'm wid you, for I'll never be without a stick to my back or a tear in my eye."

Tacitus says—"Early marriages make us immortal. It is the soul and chief of empire. That man who resolves to live without woman, and that woman who resolves to live without man, are enemies to the community in which they dwell, injurious to themselves, destructive to the whole world, apostates from nature, and rebels against heaven and earth!"

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

BOARD OF INSTRTCTION.

W. C. KENYON, A. M., } Principals.
IRA SAYLES, A. M., }

Assisted by nine able and experienced Teachers, five in the Male Department, and four in the Female Department.

The Trustees of this Institution, in putting forth another Annual Circular, would take this opportunity to express their thanks to its numerous patrons, for the very liberal support extended to it during the past ten years that it has been in operation; and they hope, by continuing to augment its facilities, to also continue to merit a share of public patronage

Extensive buildings are now erected for the accommodation of students, and for Recitation and Lecture Rooms, &c. They occupy an eligible position, and are finished in the best style of modern architecture; and the different apartments are heated by hot air, a method decidedly the most pleasant and economical

Ladies and Gentlemen will occupy separate buildings, under the immediate care of their teachers. They will board in the Hall, with the Professors and their families, who will be responsible for furnishing good board, and for the order of the Hall. Board and rooms can also be had in private families, if particularly desired.

Each room for those who board in the Hall is furnished with a bed and bedding, a table, two chairs, and a pail.

The plan of instruction adopted in this Institution, aims at a complete development of all the moral, intellectual, and physical powers of the student, in a manner to render them thorough practical scholars prepared to meet the great responsibilities of active life. Our prime motto is, "The Health, the Manners, and the Morals of our Students." To secure these most desirable ends, the following Regulations are instituted, without an unreserved compliance with which, no student should think of entering the Institution.

REGULATIONS.

1. No student will be excused to leave town, except to visit home, unless by the expressed wish of such student's parent or guardian.
2. Punctuality in attending all regular Academic exercises will be required.
3. The use of Tobacco, for chewing or smoking, will not be allowed either in or about the Academic buildings.
4. Playing at games of chance cannot be allowed.
5. Using profane language cannot be allowed.
6. The use of any kind of intoxicating drinks cannot be allowed, unless prescribed in case of sickness, by a regular physician.
7. Passing from room to room by students during the regular hours of study, or after the ringing of the first bell each evening, cannot be permitted.
8. Gentlemen and ladies of the Institution will not be permitted to visit the rooms of the opposite sex, except in cases of imperious necessity, and then it must not be done without permission previously obtained from one of the Principals.
9. Good order must be maintained at all times, and in all the rooms and halls of the Institution, and in all the intercourse of students with each other.
10. All students are required to retire regularly at the ringing of the bell designated for that purpose, as occasion may require; and to rise at the ringing of the morning bell, also designated.
11. Any room, occupied by students, will, at all times, be subject to the visitation of the Teachers of the Institution, who are required to see that the regulations are complied with.
12. Students will be required to keep their own rooms in good order, and to pay all unnecessary damages, either of rooms or of furniture furnished with the rooms.

REGULAR ACADEMIC EXERCISES.

The regular exercises, at which all the students will be required to attend, unless specially excused, are, Chapel exercises each morning during the term; Recitations, from two to four, five days each week, from Monday morning till Friday evening. Compositions and Declamations, one-half day, once in two weeks, Literary, Scientific, and Moral Lectures by the Principals. Public Worship, once in each week, either on Saturday or Sunday, according as the students may be in the habit of keeping the Sabbath, either on the seventh or first day of the week.

GOVERNMENT.

The Government of the students will be in the hands of the Principals, and will be strictly and steadily exercised, and at the same time, strictly parental. The object of our academic government being to secure the greatest possible amount of physical, intellectual, and moral good to the students themselves, regularity and order of exercises, and good and wholesome citizens to society. No unwarrantable means will be made use of to enforce the observance of the above regulations; yet our constant endeavor will be, to make the means resorted to as effective as humun means may be.

Parents who place their children in this Institution, and all students who are sufficiently old to understand the necessity of order, cannot be too well assured that the foregoing regulations form the most essential part of the contract between them and us; and that whatever student wantonly violates them, and shows himself incorrigibly determined on pursuing his waywardness, will be expelled from the privileges of the Institution, and will not be permitted to re-enter it again, without special proof of reformation. Nor will an expelled student have any deduction made from full term charges.

Farther, parents are requested not to place money for expenses, in the hands of students who are not old enough to use money with discretion and economy. Either of the Principals, or the Book-keeper of the Institution, will act as fiscal guardian of such students without charge.

ADMISSION.

Candidates for admission as students, must present testimonials of good moral character, or be known to possess such a character, and must be willing to comply unreservedly with the foregoing regulations; and no one will be permitted to receive instructions in any class, until all academic bills, for the term in prospect, be paid or satisfactorily arranged.

ACADEMIC TERMS.

The Academic Year for 1848-9 consists of three terms, as follows:

The First, commencing Tuesday, August 15, 1848, and ending Thursday, November 23, 1848.

The Second, commencing Tuesday, December 5, 1848, and ending Thursday, March 15, 1849.

The Third, commencing Tuesday, April 3, 1849, and ending July 12, 1849.

As the plan of instruction in this Institution, laid out for each class, will require the entire term for its completion, it is of the utmost importance that students should continue through the term, and accordingly, no student will be admitted for any length of time less than a term, extraordinaries excepted.

Students prepared to enter classes already in operation, can be admitted at any time in the terms.

N. B. Students who are expecting to teach during the winter or summer, will specify such intention on entering in the beginning of the fall or spring term; and, for the special accommodation of such, a day will be set apart at first, on which they can leave, if they wish; and they will not be permitted to leave on any other day, nor will any other than teachers be permitted to leave on the day specified.

Farther, it is of the utmost importance that the student be present at the day of the opening of the term, as on that and the succeeding day, the students entering are examined and classified.

It is also suggested to parents who patronize this Institution from the distance of a few miles around, that students should go home only once during the term, as every absence from classes is always attended with disadvantages to the student. This is a suggestion, and not imperative. But to meet this suggestion, the exercise of the school will close at noon on the seventh Friday in each term, and open again on the afternoon of Monday following.

JAMES A. BEGG ON THE SABBATH.

It is not, however, their general condition of heart and life, before God, with which we are at present to be occupied. We have, indeed, no doubt that an exact correspondence there was, as there ever is, and as may be traced, between the measure of their general fidelity and that of their faithful observance of the day "holy of the Lord, and honorable." A correct estimate, we believe, might at any period of their history have been formed, both of their moral and spiritual state, from a faithful record of the manner in which they sanctified the Sabbath. For all correct knowledge of the character of God, and true love to Him, in which alone moral and spiritual attainment is made, ever prompt to perfect obedience to the divine precepts as best fitted to promote the divine glory. And by the faithful of Israel a true knowledge of God and love to Him were enjoyed. If others by the observance and statutes of the Lord sought to work out a righteousness for themselves, and in doing so made the law of liberty one of bondage, still it is true that unto them was the Gospel preached, as well as unto us; and, of the believing among them, we are told, that "they did all eat the same spiritual meat, and did all drink the same spiritual drink." Unbelief, alone, occasioned on the part of any, a coming short in regard to present sanctification, and the assurance of future glory.

The object of our present sketch, however, confines us to a consideration of the statements in the inspired word bearing on their observance of the Sabbath, from the period of God's annunciation of His law at Sinai. In the citations already made, the Lord testifies against Israel's profanation of it in the wilderness, and threatens to pour out His fury upon them on this account, although He wrought that His name should not be polluted before the heathen. Such importance, as we have seen, does God attach to the sanctification of His holy day, that Israel's pollution of it is given in the prophecies of Ezekiel as a reason for His dispossessing them of their land, and dispersing them through the countries, as it is at the present day. So, again, in like manner do we here find Moses, their law-giver, at a far earlier period, even before they had entered the land, predicting to them their being afterwards scattered among the heathen, connecting also with this their sad fate, as a cause of it, their profanation of the Sabbath. While they are removed from their land, it shall enjoy its Sabbaths, lying desolate, "because it did not rest in your Sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it." When Moses wrote this, Israel had not even entered the promised land; but He who sees the end from the beginning, thus enables His servant to foretell their after sin and its punishment. But as that punishment still continues, in their being still kept away from their own land, and they are still in the lands of their enemies, so also must the sin be of equal continuance. And if the profanation of God's Sabbath is still visited with chastisement, its obligation must still be resting upon them. Thus does even Moses give us a development of the mind of God concerning Israel's duty in the matter, not only at the time he wrote, but also at the present time, and so long as they be in their enemies' lands. For their duty in regard to it, after their return to their own land, we shall yet have occasion to examine other texts. The land is now enjoying its Sabbaths, while it lieth desolate, because it was not allowed truly and duly to rest in holy sabbatism by its people, while they were in and enjoyed it.

After the death of Moses, the Lord encouraged Joshua, who had been his minister, to follow in the same good path, with the assurance that if Israel obeyed His law they should continue to enjoy the expression of the divine approbation, in every form. "As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee; I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. Be strong and of a good courage; for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land which I sware unto their fathers to give them. Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law which Moses my servant commanded thee; turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest. The book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein, day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein; for then shalt thou make thy way prosperous, and thou shalt have good success." Josh. 1: 5—8. The entire law, including therefore the fourth commandment, in its integrity, is thus solemnly reënjoined. They are not to turn to the right hand or to the left. No room is left for part of the commandment being positive as distinguished from another part, which shall be called moral—the so-called positive to be abrogated by human authority. Here, the entire law, in its fullest sense, is reënjoined; meditation day and night in the book of the law is required from him who is to administer according to its provisions; and prosperity is the accompanying blessing promised to their obedience.

From time to time in their history does the Lord manifest His concern for the blessing of Israel in their obedience; and, on the part of those among them who truly knew and loved Him, that obedience was joyfully rendered. After the defeat of the king of Ai, and the discovery of Achan's sin, "Joshua built an altar unto the Lord God of Israel in mount Ebal, as Moses the servant of the Lord commanded the children of Israel, as it is written in the book of the law of Moses; an altar of whole stones, over which no man hath lift up any iron; and they offered thereon burnt offerings unto the Lord, and sacrificed peace-offerings. And he wrote there upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses, which he wrote in the presence of the children of Israel. And all Israel, and their elders, and officers, and their judges, stood on this side of the ark and on that side, before the priests, the Levites, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, as well the stranger as he that was born among them; half of them over against Mount Gerizim, and half of them over against Mount Ebal; as Moses the servant of the Lord had commanded before, that they should bless the people of Israel. And afterwards he read all the words of the law, the blessings and cursings, according to all that is written in the book of the law. There was not a word of all that Moses commanded which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel, with the women and the little ones, and the strangers that were conversant among them." Josh. 8: 30—35.

The fourth commandment, (with which our inquiry at present is mainly concerned,) embraces within its authority and purpose of blessing, not only the children of Israel, their children and servants, but also "the stranger" within their gates; so here we find Joshua reading the law which includes that commandment in the hearing of those "strangers that were conversant among them," as that in which they were really interested.

When they had subdued the promised land, and divided it by lot among their several tribes, "and the Lord gave them rest round about," Joshua called the Reubenites and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, and said unto them, Ye have kept all that Moses the servant of the Lord commanded you, and have obeyed my voice in all that I commanded you; ye have not left your brethren these many days unto this day, but have kept the charge of the commandment of the Lord your God. And now the Lord your God hath given rest unto your brethren as he promised them; therefore, now return ye, and get you unto your tents, and unto the land of your possession, which Moses the servant of the Lord gave you on the other side Jordan. But take diligent heed to do the commandment and the law, which Moses the servant of the Lord charged you, to love the Lord your God, and to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and to cleave unto Him, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul. So Joshua blessed them, and sent them away, and they went unto their tents." Josh. 22: 1—6.

In his parting blessing, when "going the way of all the earth," Joshua recapitulates the goodness of God to His people, encourages them to cleave still unto the Lord, to be "very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, that ye turn not aside therefrom to the right hand or to the left." And he encourages them to "fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and in truth." Josh. 23: 6, 14; 24: 14.

Israel being now fully established in their land, we have but little account of their Sabbath observance, which, however, we can have no doubt, was by the faithful among them regularly sanctified. For some hundred years it is not mentioned; but from the allusions made at that later period, it may be fairly regarded as a matter of certainty that meanwhile, by many, it was both acknowledged and prized. The account of the various offices of the Tabernacle in the time of David, when it is stated that certain "of the sons of the Kohathites were over the shew bread, to prepare it every Sabbath," (1 Chron. 9: 32,) is the first of these, and such an allusion could be made only to what was fully acknowledged. In the separation of the Levites generally, "to stand every morning to thank and praise the Lord, and likewise at even; and to offer all burnt-sacrifices unto the Lord, in the Sabbaths, in the New Moons, and on the set-feasts, by number according to the order commanded unto them continually before the Lord," (1 Chron. 23: 30, 31,) we have another similar allusion, the brevity of which also seems to intimate that it needed no explanation, which it would have done, had it related the reëstablishment of an ordinance long neglected. These allusions to the Sabbath in the account of the place which certain occupied in its ministrations, indicate that the Sabbath itself was well known, as they intimate that they were done in obedience to the injunctions of the law as given by Moses—the first to Lev. 24: 5—8, and the last having more general reference to Numb. 28: 10.

Our next quotation is from Solomon's message to Hiram, King of Tyre: "Behold I build an house to the name of the Lord my God, to dedicate it to Him, and to burn before Him sweet incense, and for the continual show bread, and for the burnt-offerings, morning and evening, on the Sabbaths, and on the new moons, and on the solemn feasts of the Lord our God. This is an ordinance FOR EVER to Israel. 2 Chron. 2: 4. Solomon here evidently distinguishes between the weekly Sabbath and "the solemn feasts," while both are declared to be "for ever, to Israel." This is in perfect accordance with what we have seen of the statements of Moses relative to these institutions; and it is of importance that we keep before the mind, in our progressive advancement, how their perpetuity to Israel continues to be asserted as the mind of God, expressed by His servants nearly five hundred years after His people had left the land of Egypt. There is still here no intimation of a new Sabbath—but a promise that the Sabbath which then was, should be to Israel, at least, the Sabbath "for ever."

The Temple having been built and dedicated, "Solomon offered burnt-offerings unto the Lord, on the altar of the Lord, which he had built before the porch, even after a certain rate every day, offering according to the commandment of Moses, on the Sabbaths, and on the new moons, and on the solemn feasts, three times in the year, even in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles." 2 Chron. 8: 12, 13. We have thus again the three annual solemn festivals distinguished both from the new moons and from the Sabbaths, and the observance of all is in obedience to God's ordinances delivered long before—even "according to the commandment of Moses." [To be continued.

GETHSEMANE.

Passing out of the Jaffa gate, we rambled down the Valley of Gihon, around the base of Zion, to the Pool of Siloam. At this point my companions left me, and I continued my walk alone, up the valley of Jehosaphat, not displeased with the opportunity of a solitary wandering among the tombs, and of standing alone upon the sacred soil of Gethsemane. Again and again had I passed by the enclosure, but could not bring myself to enter it; now, however, I was alone, and soon to depart from the Holy City, and my feelings had been softened by a walk among the tombs. At the foot of Mount Olivet, just opposite St. Stephen's Gate, a rude stone wall encloses about a quarter of an acre of ground, in which stand eight ancient olive trees, some of them very large. There is little doubt that this enclosure was the spot of our Savior's sufferings on that fearful night when he was betrayed.

Musing on the affecting narrative of the Evangelist, I approached, climbed over the tottering wall, and sat down at the foot of a knarled and shattered olive, that seemed to my excited imagination, as if it might have stood there and heard the Savior's cry, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me." The stillness of the place was oppressive. The Temple wall overhangs the spot, but no hum of life comes upon the breeze over its gloomy battlements. My heart sunk deeper in sadness as I heard the croak of a raven that flew over the apparently deserted city. All that remains of Gethsemane harmonizes with sad associations of the place. No one can walk under its venerable olives, and think of the meek sufferer who once poured out upon its soil "great drops of sweat and blood," and yet in his agony cried, "Father, not my will but thine be done," without a deeper love for the Redeemer, and a stronger "fellowship of his sufferings." Mine eyes were constrained to attest the power of the place over the heart, and, as I rose to depart, I voluntarily exclaimed, "I must go hence, and never again shall I see thee, O Gethsemane! But I shall see the Lord of life and glory coming the second time without sin unto salvation; and may I so live as to hail him at the resurrection, with the exclamation, Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." ## STAND FOR THE RIGHT.

Be firm and faithful,
Desert not the right,
The brave become bolder
The darker the night!
Then up and be doing,
Though cowards may fail,
Thy duty pursuing,
Dare all, and prevail.

If scorn be thy portion,
If hatred and loss,
If stripes and if prison,
Remember the cross!
God watches above thee,
And He will requite;
Desert those that love thee,
But never the right.

AUGUSTUS NEANDER.

The American student will not remain long at Berlin, without seeking an introduction to Neander. Near the head of Charlotte street, on the left, you find the entrance to his house; and if the hour of your call be the hour for reception of company, you find ready access to his study. Out of the half dozen or dozen in the room, you are at a loss to whom to make your address, till one of the number, in an old German Schlafrock, presents himself. You take him for the professor's servant, and immediately begin to speculate on the physical extremities to which the working-classes in Prussia must be reduced. You hand him your letter. This waiting-man reads it—probably this is the way in Germany; he then extends his hand, and gives you a welcome in English! You find you have made a slight mistake. This man in untidy dress, half-combed, black hair, with a sprinkling of gray ones—for he now lacks but one year of sixty, is the veritable professor himself. If you measure a little over five feet, you are in stature just upon a level with him. His Jewish physiognomy excites no surprise, for he is by birth of the stock of Israel; and yet, despite of heavy eye-brows, timid eyes, and a sallow complexion, a decidedly benevolent expression lights up his countenance. One little peculiarity you will be likely to remember, and that is the grasp, or rather absence of grasp, of his hand. His arm you fancy to be an elongated, flaccid piece of cartilage. He seems to have no bones, no muscles. It is not strange, then, that he should have no manners. By this is not meant that he is unmannerly; but a negation of all manners, good, bad, and indifferent, is intended.

Neander shows more cordiality than could be expected from a recluse scholar—a student of antiquity; still, he might like you full as well, if you were done up in vellum, and labeled St. Chrysostom, or St. Bernard. Warm sympathies he has with the present, with living men, men who can converse, as well as with those who have written; but he looks at them far less in their personal and local, than in their philosophical, relations. No one can find fault with him for this; but it is connected with peculiarities of abstraction, which are strikingly singular. It is a current saying in Berlin, that, to this day, the professor cannot find his way alone to the University, although the distance from his house does not exceed the fourth of a mile. He never goes out, except accompanied by a sister or some other guide. He is shortsighted, to be sure; but it is owing more to habits of severe and constant study, that he is so little observant of "the things that are seen." Indeed the sentence in the fac-simile under his engraved likeness is appropriate to his physical, as well as his spiritual being—"Now we see through a glass darkly."

In the lecture room, he always commences by taking up an old pen or quill, deposited expressly for the purpose, upon the desk before him. This he twirls, twists and snaps incessantly, till the lecture is finished. To this habit he is a perfect bond-servant. Having only a brief before him, he would not be able to proceed at all, without this monitor.

Opening any of the many books upon his study table or study floor, you need not be surprised if louis d'or slip out, the half-yearly fee of some student, who has a receipt for this payment, of which the professor has no recollection and very little care. He really is not competent to take care of money or of himself. Either is liable, at any time, to be lost between the lids of a folio.

But this man, whose "bodily presence is weak, and speech contemptible," is confessedly at the head of ecclesiastical historians, whether living or dead. No one has ever united to a minute and comprehensive acquaintance with patristic learning, so much of noble philosophy, and spiritual Christianity. [Ch. Obs.

ENGLISH ARMS AND RELIGION.

It is not to be denied, says the N. Y. Recorder, that English arms have opened India to evangelization—not designedly, indeed, but as a consequence of opening it to commerce; nor should it cease to be a matter of thanksgiving to God, that he has overruled the wrath and the avarice of man, so as to secure many glorious fruits of Christianity on the fields of India—but it is, nevertheless, a most lamentable fact, that the very means by which England maintains her sway in the East, create a prejudice against her religion, which constitutes a chief difficulty in the way of its progress. On this point we refer the reader to an extract of a letter from India to the American Peace Society, dated Bombay, July 27, 1847:—

Much has been published in America concerning the religion of the Hindoos; but I have seen little in American works concerning the general state of the country. The political state of India has no parallel in the history of the world. A country with more than 100,000,000 of inhabitants in subjection to a nation containing not more than one-fourth as many, of another complexion, of a different religion, and living in a distant part of the globe, separated by continents and seas. India has had fearful experience of the power of Christian nations—a power for which they are indebted, in a great degree, to the direct or indirect influence of Christianity. But her inhabitants have yet seen but little to produce the conviction that this religion in its spirit and its object is emphatically a religion of peace, and that the Saviour, in whom those nations profess to trust, and whose name they bear, is called the "Prince of Peace." England conquered India by the sword, and by the same means possession is still retained. The military force supported by the English in India for ten years past, has exceeded, on an average, 200,000 men; and the annual expenditure for this immense army has exceeded $45,000,000. For the two past years the army has been 250,000, and the expenditure for it exceeded $50,000,000 annually. The debts of the government—money borrowed to sustain the expenses of its numerous wars—now exceed $200,000,000. Within eight years past, the English government in India has been engaged in five different and successive wars, namely, the Affghan war, the Sciudian war, (with a native prince whose dominions are situated between Agra and the Deckan,) the Scinde war, (with native princes whose dominions were on the Indus for several hundred miles from its mouth,) the war in the northern Mahratta country with Kulapore and Savant Warre; and lastly, the war in the Punjaub or with the Seiks. These do not include the war with China, as that was regarded as a war between England and China, though the causes of it originated in the opium trade between India and China, and a large military force was sent from India to assist in carrying it on. More than nine-tenths of all the Europeans in this country are connected with the army.

AN AFFECTING COINCIDENCE.

Some time during the year 1845, an Englishman, Mr. John D. Ross, who had been the editor of one of the first journals in that country, but who had become intemperate, left his family to wander in the United States. He was under engagements to correspond with some of the newspapers of his own country, but had failed to do so, and was nearly reduced to a penniless condition. While sauntering through the streets in Philadelphia, his attention was attracted to a bill posted up in public places, by which he learned that Mr. John B. Gough, "the young man eloquent," would on that evening deliver a temperance address at the Chinese Museum. Being fond of listening to eloquent speakers, he was induced to attend the meeting, and his heart was moved to that degree, by the eloquence of Mr. Gough, that on the following day he addressed a letter to him, desiring an interview. Mr. G. called upon him and induced him to sign the pledge. He also kindly furnished him with sixty dollars, with which to purchase clothing and necessaries. He accompanied Mr. G. to Boston, and was soon engaged to contribute an article each day to one of the leading papers in that city, at a salary of twelve hundred dollars a year. He also found other employment for his pen, and continuing in the path of total abstinence, it is needless to say, he became once more a man.

At length he determined to return home. He had, as may well be supposed, become much attached to Mr. Gough. Upon parting with him, he grasped his hand and said, "John, my heart, my hand, my purse, are yours. What can I do for you to repay your kindness to me." Mr Gough told him that he knew of only one service which might be performed for him in England—viz: to ascertain the particulars of his aged father's death, for, having been unable to learn anything respecting him for several years, although he had written frequently, he doubted not that he was in his grave. Yet it would afford him a melancholy satisfaction to learn that he was cared for in his last hours.

Mr. Ross promised to do all in his power to obtain the desired information, and they parted. Mr. Ross, on his return to England, visited Sandgate, the place of Mr. Gough's nativity, saw Mr. Purday, the keeper of the village library, who corroborates the statements made by Mr. G. in his autobiography, respecting his early life, and finally stated his belief that the old gentleman was still alive, although he had not yet found him.

A few days since Mr. Gough received a letter from his father. Mr. Ross had visited him and related to him the history of his son while in America, of which he was, up to that time, in ignorance. The old gentleman went to a bookstore and inquired for "the life of John B. Gough." "That is my son's life," said he, when it was handed to him. The shopkeeper made him a present of a copy, which, we can easily believe, he perused with interest.

Mr. G. has sent for his father and expects to see him in two months.

Thus has Mr. Gough been instrumental in restoring a gifted man to himself and family; and he, in return, has restored to Mr. G. a long-lost father. Reader, go cast thy bread upon the waters, believing it will return to thee after many days. [Conn. Fountain.

JEWS OF PRAGUE.

One afternoon I took a stroll into the Jewish quarter, known in the expressive German as the Judenstadt. It is one of the oldest colonies in Europe, and the persecutions and massacres of earlier times, and hereditary prejudices at the present, have helped to keep them a distinct people. They are now no longer locked up in their own streets at eight o'clock in the evening, and they are even allowed their own schools and magistrates. As in every Jews' quarter, there are the same intelligent, hard faces, and there are the same streets of old clothes and small wares; and now and then, as you saunter carelessly along, you are perhaps half startled at seeing, leaning archly over some little counter, the beautiful form of some bright-eyed and dark-haired Naomi or Rebecca. The Jews of Prague boast of the most ancient synagogue in Europe, it having stood, as they alledge, a thousand years. After a diligent search for the sexton, I gained admission to the most curious, dark and dingy place of worship I ever beheld. The windows were exceedingly small; there was some religious scruple against any kind of cleansing, and the walls and high roof were blackened by time and the smoke of the lamps and torches that for days together are sometimes burning during their more solemn services. There were some curiously wrought lamps and furniture, exhibiting the mysterious number seven, and reminding one of the descriptions of the Old Testament, and in the place of the altar of a church was a sacred enclosure for the holy books of the law. Separated from the body of the synagogue, and communicating with it only by apertures through the wall, about the size of an ordinary pane of glass, was the apartment to which the females only were admitted.

Not far away was their spacious ancient burial-ground. I wandered a while in this lonely place, brushed away the snow from some of the little heaps of stones, brought one by one as tributes to departed friends, and gazed vacantly on the curious symbols and the Hebrew characters engraved on weather-beaten, crumbling, grave-stones. It is crowded to its utmost capacity. More than a century has elapsed since the last interment. The talkative guide explained the epitaphs on some, pointed out the more imposing monuments of their dignataries and rabbis: and, with something of a look of pride, as I thought, showed me the grave of a Jewess who, by some freak of fortune, had married a Prince, and had preferred in death to sleep with her people.

SELF-EVIDENCING POWER OF THE BIBLE.—In illustration of what Dr. Owen used to call the self-evidencing power of the Bible, "I may mention that one of our missionary brethren," says Mr. Weibrecht, "was once attacked by a Brahmin who affirmed that the assertion constantly made as to our Scriptures being very ancient, was untrue; for, said he, I can prove that one chapter of your sacred book has been written since your arrival in this country. To what part do you allude? rejoined the missionary. To the first chapter of the Romans, said the Brahmin; I am sure you could never have written so exact a description of the Hindoos had you not first seen them." Here was a testimony to the Bible—to the omniscience of Him who so well knows what is in man.

MAN'S WORK IN CONVERSION.—An illiterate son of Africa, in relating his experience before the church, preparatory to baptism, closed by saying, "Arter all, God did a part, and me did a part." "Ah! Cuffee," said the minister, "you must explain this; you say, 'God did a part, and you did the rest.' Tell us what part of the work God did, and what part you did." "Berry well, Massa; God he sees me run away, and he run arter me, he make me feel berry bad. Me fight him. He make me feel a heap worser, get so bad, he seem kill me. Den he show how Jesus he die for me. Me den feel happy. God do all de good work, me do all de bad work. Dat is it, Massa."

WE DO NOT PRAY ENOUGH.—Felix Neff once made the following comparison: "When a pump is frequently used, but little pains are necessary to have water; the water pours out the first stroke, because it is high. But if the pump has not been used for a long time, the water gets low, and when you want it you must pump a long while, and the water comes only after great effort. It is so with prayer. If we are constant in prayer, every little circumstance awakens the disposition to pray, and desires and words are always ready. But if we neglect prayer, it is difficult for us to pray, for the well gets low.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, October 12, 1848.

From the Oberlin Evangelist.

A change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week directly predicted in the Old Testament.

"Seven days shall they purge the altar and purify it, and they shall consecrate themselves. And when these days are expired, it shall be that upon the eighth day, and so forward, the priests shall make your burnt-offerings upon the altar, and your peace-offerings: and I will accept you, saith the Lord your God."—Ezek. 43: 26, 27.

The following paragraph, from Sawyer's Moral Philosophy, pertaining to the passage above cited, deserves special attention. The prophet, under the figure of a mystical temple, is shadowing forth the glories of the new dispensation. The offering of sacrifices constituted one of the main features of the worship under the old dispensation. When, therefore, the prophet affirms, that from the time of the purification of the altar, and so forward, sacrifices should be offered on the eighth instead of the seventh day of the week, he designates the former instead of the latter, as the day for public worship under the present dispensation. We can conceive of no other meaning which can legitimately be attached to the prophecy under consideration. In confirmation of these remarks, let the reader now attentively peruse the following paragraphs, containing Mr. Sawyer's remarks upon the passage above cited:—

"This passage relates to the service of the mystical temple seen by Ezekiel. The purging of the altar denotes the expiation made for the sins of men by the death of Christ. Christian worship is described by imagery taken from the worship of the former dispensation. Its description as consisting in the offering of sacrifices and peace-offerings is figurative, and these terms are applied to denote Christian worship, because the services to which they refer were the principal parts of divine worship in the times when the prophecy was written. The performance of Christian worship on the eighth day, and so on, clearly implies that a change was to take place in respect to the Sabbath, by which it would be transferred to the next day, and so on; and that under the Christian dispensation the Sabbath would be observed on the first day of the week, the first Christian Sabbath being considered as the eighth day of the week, to which it was subjoined.

"This prediction of the change of the Sabbath to the first day of the week is expressed in figurative terms, but is in the highest degree explicit. It admits clearly of the interpretation which has now been given it, and does not admit of any other."

Remarks.

The above extract from the Oberlin Evangelist, furnishes an illustration of the manner in which, as sceptics often sneeringly affirm, every man can prove his own theory from the Bible. The concluding chapters of the prophecy of Ezekiel are occupied with an account of his wonderful vision of a glorious temple and its ordinances, which he was commanded to declare to the House of Israel, "that they may keep the whole form thereof, and all the ordinances thereof, and do them." The prophet describes very minutely the situation of the temple, its ground plan and elevations, its various ornaments, its ministering priesthood, and its prescribed sacrifices. The whole description is of such a character as to impress the reader with the importance and significance of the prophecy, and excite in him a desire to know when and why such an imposing temple is to be erected and such sacrifices instituted. Hence it has been the subject of a great deal of speculation among writers upon prophecy. One class of them regard it as furnishing incontrovertible evidence that a splendid temple is yet to be erected in Jerusalem, into which the Lord will come. Another class attempt, by a spiritualizing process, to transform all the parts of the building described, and all its enjoined institutions, into something pertaining to the Christian Church. A third class—and it embraces some of the most eminent commentators—admit that the prophecy has not yet been fulfilled, but decline giving any exposition of it, because they consider it as at present inexplicable. Now from the very heart of this prophetic description of the temple and its services, is taken the passage above quoted from Ezekiel as a "direct prediction" of the change of the Sabbath—although the term Sabbath is not used, nor is the institution alluded to directly or indirectly! The passage is followed by others which describe the ordinances of the Sabbath in the state of things to which the prophecy alludes, and say that "the burnt-offering that the prince shall offer in the Sabbath day shall be six lambs without blemish, and a ram without blemish." How any man who has read that portion of the Scriptures which precedes this prophecy, can question what day is here meant by the term Sabbath—and how any man who has read the whole of Ezekiel's description of the temple and its ordinances, can suppose that in the text under consideration he alludes to a change of the Sabbath—is more than we can tell. We have heard and read a great many far-fetched and abstruse arguments for the change of the Sabbath; but this, although heralded as a "direct prediction," we regard as exceeding them all. Suppose a friend of the first day, attempting to reprove an unbeliever for neglecting it, should be told that there is no scriptural argument to observe the first day, and should bring up this passage in proof of the change of the Sabbath—what sort of a figure would he make? If we may judge others by our own experience in presenting a lame argument, he would halt and stammer, and expect to be laughed in the face by his opponent. Thank God the sabbatic institution, and the claims of the seventh day, rest upon no such arguments. "God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it"—"The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." Such is the language of Scripture in relation to God's institution. When will men learn to take the institution as it is, without engrafting upon it changes and modifications, to justify which they need the support of arguments which kill the force of all their appeals?

Both the editor of the Evangelist, and Mr. Sawyer, from whom he quotes, speak of the difficulty of interpreting the prophecy in any other way than they have done, and seem to regard that as a reason for adopting their interpretation. Upon this point, we beg leave to differ from them. The fact that a man "can conceive of no other meaning which can legitimately be attached to a prophecy," than one which makes it predict a change of a divine commandment, is a very poor reason for so interpreting it as to favor such a change. In our humble opinion, it would be much better policy, and altogether more becoming the Christian teacher, to interpret the prophecies just so far as he can do it without conflicting with laws and principles which God has revealed, and there stop, than to go on interpreting them in this way or that because, as he conceives, they cannot be interpreted in any other way. This notion that a man must interpret every prophecy of Scripture to prove himself a complete biblical scholar, has led to the promulgation of theories over which sober Christians may well weep while infidels laugh.

If we had not already given too much room to this subject, we would say something about the history of the change of the Sabbath, and show that what Ezekiel is represented as having prophesied would take place, did not take place at the introduction of the "Christian dispensation," so that either he was not a true prophet, or his interpreters are not true interpreters. For the present it must suffice to say, that the notion of the Sabbath's having been changed at the introduction of the Christian dispensation, and of the first day's having been observed as the Sabbath ever since, is not sustained by facts. During the first three hundred years after Christ, the seventh day was kept by Christians as the Sabbath. Meanwhile the partial observance of the first day, as a festival, was introduced and became popular. In the fourth century the observance of the first day, or dominical day as it was called, was extolled and enforced by Constantine, while the observance of the Sabbath was discountenanced. Through the influence of courts and councils, the first day gradually superseded the seventh—not as the Sabbath, but as a festival. During the dark ages, the Sabbath found but few adherents, the mass of people preferring a joyful festival to a day of sacred rest. The Reformation introduced a new order of things; but the leading reformers denied the sabbatic character of the first day, asserting that it was taken up for convenience, and might be changed at any time by the magistrates. They were opposed on the one hand by the Puritans, who contended that the first day was the Sabbath, and on the other hand by the Sabbatarians, who advocated the claims of the seventh day. The first work written in the English language to support the notion that the day of the Sabbath was changed by divine authority, dates no earlier than 1595. And those who have thoroughly examined the subject know, that this notion cannot be traced back more than about three hundred years, or to the rise of the Puritans. Such facts are very wonderful if the change of the Sabbath at the introduction of the Christian dispensation was so early determined upon in the Divine Mind, and so clearly prophesied of by Ezekiel.

BROOKFIELD, Madison Co., N. Y., Oct. 5, 1848.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

While on a visit at Newport, R. I., a few days past, curiosity prompted me to explore the Common Burying Ground at that place. That sacred repository of the dead is now receiving thorough repairs; the grave-stones are being re-set and painted; the latter makes the inscriptions plain and legible. On one of those stones, I find an inscription, which, being the most ancient record of the Seventh-day Baptists in America, "engraven on stones," will doubtless be read with interest by many who peruse your paper. Below I give a fac simile of the inscription:*

HERE LYETH THE BODY OF ROGER BASTER,
BACHELOR, BLOCK MAKER,
AGED 66 YERES. HE DYED
23 DAY OF APREL, 1687.
HE WAS ONE OF THE FI
RST BEGINERS OF A CHV
RCH OF CHRIST OBSVRING
OF THE 7TH DAY SAB
BATH OF THE LORD IN N E AND BEGAN 23 DIS 1671

That the above inscription may be better understood, I make the following brief extracts from Benedict's History of the Baptists, pages 418 and 419:—"The first Sabbatarian church in America was formed in Newport in 1671," &c. "Their number was seven; their names were William Hiscox, Samuel Hubbard, Stephen Mumford, Roger Baster, and three sisters. These persons formed themselves into a church, and William Hiscox became their pastor."

Most truly yours,
HOSEA B. CLARKE, of Clarksville.

* As some of the letters of the inscription are in very ancient style, and in some cases a strange blending of letters, it is difficult to procure fac simile type, and corresponding letters of modern style are substituted.

DOINGS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

From a letter written by one of the German Seventh-day Baptists of Snowhill, Pa., we learn that soon after the decision of the Supreme Court at Harrisburg, the Sheriff came and took property of Jacob Specht and Peter Fyock, which was sold to pay their fines for working on Sunday, together with the costs attending their prosecution. Three other men, Andrew Monn, David Monn, and John Burger, having no property upon which a levy could be made, would have suffered themselves to be taken to jail, except that their bail was responsible for the money. The fines and costs of the last three amounted to about twelve dollars each; those of the first two were more, but we do not know exactly how much. Probably one hundred dollars will not more than cover the expenses attending the prosecution of these five men for working on Sunday.
